the earth concretely illustrated in the life and walk of D. H. Hill. In an age when the foundations of belief are apparently dissolving under the incubus of an all-prevailing unrest, and the ceaseless "questioning of invisible things," the contrast exhibited in the attitude of Hill is grateful, as well as inspiring, like a voice calling from the vanished days of unchallengeable trust in the eternal verities. There is the absolute confidence, the urgent warning directed against needless anxiety, the "taking thought," which conveys a possible reflection upon the Divine omniscience and the Divine providence. When we recall our author's broad and accurate acquaintance with the classic literature of the Elizabethan era, one almost awaits to hear him cite Shakespeare and Bacon, in confirmation of his interpretation of the expression. Hill was familiar with the fact, known to every student of English, that the contemporary masters of our language, in many well defined instances, present the most simple and satisfactory rendering of seemingly obscure passages in the standard versions of Holy Scripture. His varied and troublous life in war, and during the saturnalian period of reconstruction, afforded him an admirable field for the application of his own teachings in the daily grapple with new problems, novel conditions, a new earth, not a new heaven, into which fate had cast him. Yet, unto the end, his faith failed not, and he endured as seeing Him who is invisible. When we recall the ceaseless and multiform activity which was characteristic of Hill and his technical training as a professional soldier, it is difficult to explain the process by which he acquired so broad and accurate a knowledge of literature and history, in nearly all their stages save the periods that are subsequent to the first half of the nineteenth century. In this regard he displays a striking resemblance to his favorite historian, for Hill, like Macaulay, was in the essential features of his intellectual development, a type and in large measure a product, of the culture and ideals which prevailed during our Augustan age, when Addison, Swift, Steele and Pope were the recognized and indisputable standards. To the modern reader, the reference to Cudworth, page 136, seems an echo from worlds no longer realized, but the citation serves to illustrate Hill's versatile knowledge and his discursive ranging among the forgotten masters of the seventeenth century. The introduction of the Swedish hero, Gustavus Adolphus, page 170, is rich in historic suggestion, for Gustavus presents a striking resemblance in genius and in character, in life and in death, to our own Stonewall Jackson. The supreme military career of each extended over the same length of years: Gustavus from 1630 to 1632; Jackson from 1861 to 1863; both died at nearly the same age; Jackson at 39; Gustavus at 38, and both fell in the moment of victory, the one at Lutzen, the other at Chancellorsville. Had Hill's book been written five or six years later, his eye would have recognized the parallel, and his hand would have traced it in every one of its distinctive features. On page 212, we read the reference to Bishop Beveridge, the subject of Browning's ghastly witticism, but turned to good account by our author, who in common with nearly every scholar of the South during the past generation, had no part in the poetry of Browning.

As the work expands, we cannot fail to observe how effectually the mathematical habitude of the author preserves its unity and guards it from unmethodical or desultory treatment. The element of system entered into every detail of his daily life. The book abounds in passages whose conciseness and lucidity adapt them to the purpose of quotation, so that we cannot forbear to draw from its varied wealth in the hope of rendering it, at least in a measure, familiar to the student of his life, who has been accustomed to contemplate him principally, if not in every sense, from the viewpoint of his genius as a soldier and his career in the armies of the Confederacy. I am endeavoring to demonstrate that his character and his achievement, if faithfully scrutinized, will reveal a literary and scholarly feature, not only worthy of critical analysis, but contributing in no small measure to the "eternity of his fame." In the light of contemporary development in the sphere of education, Hill's comments, page 228, assume a peculiar interest: "To the contaminating power of sympathy with evil doers, is to be ascribed the awful depravity of large cities. Hence, too, the low standard of morals among soldiers and sailors. Hence, also, the greater amount of wickedness in State Universities and in colleges overflowing with numbers, than in those less known and less celebrated." During the ten years that Hill was associated with Washington College and with Davidson College as professor of mathematics (1849-1859), the numerical attendance in either probably did not exceed one hundred students. He spoke from the viewpoint of his own experience, and his judgment is amply sustained by the records of that period, as well as by the living voices of many who bear in memory the academic life of the South during the years that preceded the coming of the conflict which destroyed the continuity of educational development. Nor was there more thorough and admirable teaching, though its range was restricted, to be found in that day than was received in these two modest and unaspiring colleges, the one encompassed by the mountain walls of Virginia, the other remote, difficult of access, and nursing its strength in tranquil solitude.

On page 200, we are met by a passage which seems almost an echo of one of Newman's Oxford sermons. Despite the likeness, no two characters were ever marked by more sharply defined antitheses than D. H. Hill and the Anglo-Catholic leader. "How cheering and comforting it is to know that God is more ready to send this renewing, sanctifying, interceding Spirit, than parents are to give good things to their children. Here is the great encouragement to prayer—the promise of the Spirit. We are dark, ignorant, short-sighted, and know not how to frame our petitions aright. He has all wisdom and will enlighten our understandings. Our hearts are cold and dead, but He will give them warmth and life. God, because of our sins, 'has covered Himself with a thick cloud, that our prayers should not pass through.' But when His Spirit has enabled us to believe on His Son, He will say: 'I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins; return unto me, for I have redeemed thee.' Our prayer will then be unto thee, O Lord, in an acceptable time, 'and God, even our own God, shall bless us.'" On page 8, we have an illustration drawn from Hill's memories of his experiences in Mexico. "Let the soldier be too proud to study the principles of military science, and he will be but too likely to imitate the examples of one of the mushroom generals of the Mexican war, and place his ditch on the wrong side of the fortification." The reference is to General Gideon J. Pillow, and the celebrated entrenchment at Camargo. At a later period, Hill did not hesitate to apply the same unsparing criticism to the "mushroom" type of generals developed during the War between the States.

The tone of fervid piety which, at every point, pervades the work, is a grateful contrast to the prevailing spirit in the same sphere during the contemporary age. It is inspiring to be carried back, even for an hour, into a realm of thought in which faith reigns supreme, and where the mere suggestion of doubt has apparently never entered. The same attitude reveals itself in the comments on page 69. "The command to 'pray always' implies that the heart may be lifted up in secret devotion amidst the most pressing duties of active life. Still, all should have and all might have special seasons of private prayer. Colonel Gardiner could find such seasons amidst the exciting scenes of civil war and domestic dissension. Washington could find such on his most arduous and active campaigns. David could find such even when hunted down by his enemies. Above all, the Son of God, when engaged in His glorious mission on earth, could find time to spend whole nights in secret prayer. No man can say that he is more diligently or more usefully employed than were Gardiner, Washington and our blessed Redeemer. Let no one then dare to say that he has no time for secret prayer." Had this passage been written in later years, Jackson would have been added to this enumeration of generals who have glorified God by lives consecrated to His service in secret prayer.

The Voyage of Verrazzano

The First Exploration of the North Carolina Coast by Europeans

By R. D. W. Connor,
Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

The first European to visit, explore, and describe the coast of North Carolina was Giovanni da Verrazzano, a Florentine navigator in the service of France. It is true some historians suppose that the Cabots preceded Verrazzano to this region by more than a quarter of a century; but the voyages of the Cabots are involved in so much obscurity and present so many points for controversy that it is impossible to ascertain with any degree of certainty just what parts of North America they visited. It is doubtful, to say the least, whether or not their explorations brought them as far south as our latitude; at any rate no report of their explorations describing the country and its people is now extant. Verrazzano, on the contrary, submitted to the King of France, a long and detailed report of his discoveries, dated July 8, 1524, which is the earliest known description of the coast of the United States. He coasted from Cape Fear to Newfoundland, and his account of the country and its people is one of the most interesting documents that has come down to us from the era of discovery. And yet, strange as it may seem, his exploits have almost entirely escaped the attention of North Carolina historians. Williamson and Martin dismiss his voyage with scant notice, while Hawks, Wheeler, Moore, and Ashe ignore it altogether. It is true his discoveries led to no settlements; nevertheless they form an important link in the chain of discoveries which were slowly but gradually revealing to Europe the truth about the New World; and as his report was included by Hakluyt in his "Divers Voyages," in 1582, it probably was not without influence in turning the attention of Sir Walter Raleigh toward America as a field for colonization. I propose, therefore, to relate the story of this first visit of Europeans to the shores of North Carolina.

The story of the great voyage of Columbus in 1492 was heard with wonder and delight in France and in England, but these feelings were promptly turned into a feeling of disgust at the cupidity of Spain and Portugal in laying claim to all the undiscovered regions of the earth and at the zeal with which Pope Alexander VI hastened to confirm their pretentions. France and England, however, were not prepared to admit the Spanish and Portuguese titles. "If Father Adam has left the earth to Spain and Portugal," said Francis I of France, "let them show me the will." In the course of a few years, therefore, French and English ships were sailing the waters of the Atlantic far and wide disputing the claims of Spain and Portugal and taking possession of various portions of the New World in the names of their sovereigns.

The first French expedition sent to the New World under royal auspices was the expedition of Verrazzano in 1524. But little is known of Verrazzano's career. He was born in Florence about the year 1470, and at an early age entered the maritime service of France. He seems to have performed for France about the same kind of service, though perhaps not so effectively, that Hawkins and Drake performed for England. We hear of him first as a French corsair ravaging the possessions of Spain and Portugal in the East Indies and the West Indies. On one of his privateering expeditions, 1522, he captured the rich treasure ship which Cortez had dispatched from Mexico to Spain laden with the vast spoils of the Montezuma. It is estimated that this prize yielded gold and silver bullion worth more than one and a half million dollars.

But the daring Florentine was not merely a corsair. The next year he turned his attention, for awhile at least, from privateering to the work of scientific exploration. King Francis fitted out for him four ships with which "to discover new lands by the ocean."[1] A storm drove him with two of these vessels, the Norman and the Dauphine, to seek refuge in a port in Brittany; what became of the other two we do not know. Having repaired the damages sustained from the storm, Verrazzano made a successful descent upon the coast of Spain from which the king derived some profit. Then with the Dauphine alone, he says, "we determined to make discoverie of new Countries, to prosecute the navigation we had already begun." His purpose was to find a way to Cathay (China) by a westward route. Accordingly, with a crew of fifty men, well provided with "victuals, weapons, and other ship munition" for an eight-month voyage, he set sail January 17, 1524, from a "dishabited rocke by the isle of Madera" and turned his prow toward the unknown world.

For twenty-five days Verrazzano's little caravel sped along for 500 leagues before "a faire Easterly wind," but on the twenty-sixth day he was "overtaken with as sharp and terrible a tempest as ever saylers suffered." Weathering this storm, as he said "with the divine helpe and mercifull assistance of Almighty God, and the goodnesse of our shippe, accompanied with the good happe of her fortunate name," he again fell in with a "prosperous winde," and pursued his course west by north for a little more than 400 leagues. When in the thirty-fourth parallel of latitude, he reached a low-lying coast, "a newe land," he declares, "never before scene of any man either ancient or moderne." This landfall was off the coast of what is now North Carolina near Cape Fear.

Perceiving by "the great fires" on shore that the country was inhabited, Verrazzano followed the coast southward for fifty leagues in search of "some convenient Harborough wherein to anchor and have knowledge of the place." Failing in his search, he says, "we resolved to returne backe againe towards the North, where wee found our selves troubled with the like difficultie. . . . At length being in despaire to finde any Porte, wee cast anchor upon the coast, and sent our Boate to shore, where we saw great store of people which came to the Sea side: and seeing us approach, they fled away, and sometimes would stand still and looke backe, beholding us with great admiration; but afterwards being animated and assured with signes that we made them, some of them came hard to the Sea side, seeming to rejoyce very much at the sight of us, and marveling greatly at our apparel, shape and whitenesse, shewed us by sundry signes where we might most commodiously come aland with our Boate, offering us also of their victuals to eate."

Thus for the first time the red men of our Carolina coast came in contact with the white race. It was a wonderful occasion for both. And yet, how much more wonderful it would seem if the red men could have imitated the example of their pale-face visitors and left for us their impressions of the strangers as the white men did of them. In Verrazzano's report of his voyage we have the earliest description of these natives that has come down to us. That some of his statements are erroneous is not to be marveled at; rather ought we to wonder that, considering all the circumstances, his observations of these people, as strange to him as he was to them, should approach so nearly to accuracy. Here is what he says of them:

"Now I wil briefly declare to your Maiestie their life and maners, as farre as we could have notice thereof: These people goe altogether naked, except only that they cover their privie parts with certaine skins of beasts like unto Marterns, which they fasten unto a narrow girdle made of grasse very artificially wrought, hanged about with tayles of divers other beastes, which round about their bodies hang dangling downe to their knees. Some of them weare garlands of byrdes feathers. The people are of colour russett, and not much unlike the saracens: their hayre blacke, thicke and not very long, which they tye together in a knot behind and weare it like a little taile. They are well featured in their limbes, of meane stature, and commonly somewhat bigger than we: broad breasted, strong armed, their legs and other parts of their bodies well fashioned, and they are disfigured in nothing, saving that they have somewhat broade visages, and yet not all of them: for we saw many of them wel favoured, having blacke and great eyes, with a cheerefull and steady looke, not strong of body, yet sharpe witted, nymble and exceeding great runners, as farre as we could learne by experience, and in those two last qualities they are like to the people of the East partes of the world, and especially to them of the uttermost parts of China. We could not learne of this people, their maner of living, nor their particular customs, by reason of the short abode we made on the shore, our company being but small, and our ship ryding farre off in the Sea."

After these observations on the people Verrazzano describes the country itself. It should be borne in mind that Verrazzano thought that he was on the coast of Cathay and therefore imagines that the forests which he saw at a distance would be not "altogether voyd of drugs or spicery, and other riches of golde, seeing the colour of the land doth much argue it." Such errors are common to the narratives of most of the early explorers who, thinking themselves in an oriental country, attribute to America many of the features and products of the Orient. So does Verrazzano in the following description of the Carolina coast—the first description of this region ever written—fall into similar errors. He says:

"The shoare is all covered with small sand, and so ascendeth upwards for the space of 15. foote, rising in forme of litle hils about 50. paces broad. And sayling forwards, we found certaine small Rivers and armes of the Sea, that fall downe by certaine creekes, washing the shoare on both sides as the coast lyeth. And beyond this we saw the open Countrey rising in height above the sandie shoare with many faire fields and plaines, full of mightie great woods, some very thicke, and some thinne, replenished with divers sorts of trees, as pleasant and delectable to behold, as is possible to imagine.

And your Maiestie may not thinke that these are like the woods of Hercynia or the wilde deserts of Tartary, and the Northerne coasts full of fruitless trees: But they are full of Palme trees, Bay trees, and high Cypresse trees, and many other sortes of trees unknowen in Europe, which yeeld most sweete savours farre from the shoare, the propertie whereof we could not learne from the cause aforesaid,[2] and not for any difficulty to passe through the woods, seeing they are not so thicke but that a man may passe through them. Neither doe we thinke that they, partaking of the East world round about them, are altogether voyd of drugs or spicery, and other riches of golde, seeing the colour of the land doth so much argue it. And the lande is full of many beastes, as Stags, Deere, and Hares, and likewise of Lakes and Pooles of fresh water, with great plentie of Fowles, convenient for all kinde of pleasant game. This land is in latitude 34. degrees,[3] with good and wholesome ayre, temperate, betweene hot and colde, no vehement windes doe blowe in those Regions, and those that doe commonly reigne in those coasts, are the Northwest and West windes in the summer season, (in the beginning whereof we were there) the skie cleere and faire with very little raine: and if at any time the ayre be cloudie and mistie with the Southerne winde, immediately it is dissolved and waxeth cleere and fayre againe."

Sailing northward, Verrazzano found the coast "to trend toward the East" and "saw every where very great fires, by reason of the multitude of the inhabitants." An incident soon occurred, tragic enough in its possibilities as viewed by the horrified Frenchmen, but merely amusing as we now read it in Verrazzano's narrative, which shows how difficult it was for the visitors and the natives to understand each other at their first contact. Verrazzano tells the story in the following passage:

2"By reason of the short abode we made on the shore, our company being but small, and our ship ryding farre off in the Sea."

3A few miles south of Wilmington.

"We departed from this place, still running along the coast, which we found to trend toward the East, & we saw every where great fires, by reason of the multitude of the inhabitants. While we rode on that coast, partly because it had no harborough, and for that we wanted water, we sent our boat ashoare with 25. men: where by reason of great and continuall waves that beat against the shoare, being an open Coast, without succour, none of our men could possibly goe ashoare without loosing our boate. Wee saw there many people which came unto the Shoare, making divers signes of friendship, and shewing that they were content we should come aland, and by trial we found them to very courteous and gentle, as your Maiestie shal understand by the successe. To the intent we might send them of our things, which the Indians commonly desire and esteeme, as sheetes of paper, glasses, bels, and such like trifles; we sent a young man one of our Mariners ashoare, who swimming towards them, & being within 3. or 4. yards of the shoare, not trusting them, cast the things upon the shoare; but seeking afterwards to returne, he was with such violence of the waves beaten upon the shoare, that he was so bruised that he lay there almost dead: which the Indians perceiving, ranne to catch him, and drawing him out, they carried him a little way off from the sea. The yong man perceiving they caried him, being at the first dismaied, began then greatly to feare, and cried out piteously: likewise did the Indians which did accompany him, going about to cheere him and to give him courage, and then setting him on the ground at the foote of a litle hil against the sunne, they began to behold him with great admiration, marveiling at the whitenesse of his flesh: and putting off his clothes, they made him warme at a great fire, not without our great feare which remayned in the boat, that they would have rosted him at that fire, and have eaten him. The young man having recovered his strength, and having stayed a while with them, shewed them by signes that he was desirous to returne to the ship: and they with great love clapping him fast about with many imbracings, accompanying him unto the sea, and to put him in more assurance, leaving him alone, went unto a high ground and stood there, beholding him until he was entred into the boate. This yong man observed, as we did also, that these are of colour inclining to Blacke as the other were, with their flesh very shining, of meane stature, handsome visage, and delicate limmes, and of very little strength, but of prompt wit: farther we observed not. . . ."

Proceeding still farther northward, Verrazzano coasted the shores of Virginia and Maryland, looked in at the bay of New York, and following the coast of Rhode Island, entered the harbor of Newport, where he rested at anchor for fifteen days. Everywhere the natives welcomed the French with signs of great joy and friendship. But after leaving the harbor of Newport the voyagers noted a decided change in the attitude of the natives. The Indians were willing enough to trade, but showed a determination to have no further intercourse with the strangers. At times the attempts of the French to land were met with wild war-whoops and showers of arrows which speedily drove them back to their ship. Coasting the shores of Maine, Verrazzano pursued his voyage as far north as Newfoundland. His supplies now beginning to run short, he set sail for France, and cast anchor in the harbor of Dieppe early in July. There on July 8, 1524, he wrote and dispatched to the King, Francis I., "the earliest description known to exist of the shores of the United States."[4]

Verrazzano was eager to return to the New World, plant a colony there, and become the bearer of the Christian religion to the savage tribes of America. But the situation of

4 The authorities for Verrazzano's voyage are his letter of July 8, 1524, to the King, a map of the world drawn by his brother in 1529, and certain references to his voyage in early French, Spanish, Portuguese and English writers. Within recent years the authenticity of Verrazzano's letter has been called into question. It has been asserted that the letter is a forgery, ingeniously prepared in France with the connivance of the King to serve as a basis for a claim to territory in America, and that Verrazzano never came to America at all.

The original of Verrazzano's letter to the King is not known to be in existence. There are two copies of it extant, both of which are Italian translations. One of these was printed by Ramusio in 1556. Ramusio asserts that he had conversed with many persons who had known Verrazzano, and he prints a paper in which Verrazzano's voyage is mentioned by a contemporary. Parkman: The Pioneers of France in the New World, p. 231-32. (Note.)

From Ramusio's copy Hakluyt made the English translation for his "Divers Voyages," published in 1582. Hakluyt also makes several references to Verrazzano's discoveries in the dedication to his "Divers Voyages" and in his "Discourse on Westerne Planting."—Winsor: Narrative and Critical History of America, IV., 17.

The other copy of Verrazzano's letter was found in the Strozzi Library in Florence and published with an English translation by the New York Historical Society in 1841. Along with this copy was found a letter written from Lyons, Aug. 4, 1524, by Fernando Carli to his father in Florence. Carli writes of the arrival of Verrazzano at Dieppe and sends a copy in Italian of his account of his voyage which Carli thought would interest the people of the navigator's native city.—Winsor: Nar. and Crit. Hist. IV., 17.

In 1529, Hieronimo da Verrazzano, brother of Giovanni da Verrazzano, made a large map of the world, now preserved in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, on which the discoveries of Verrazzano are laid down. That part of North America explored by him bears the following legend: "Verrazzano, or New Gaul, which was discovered five years ago by Giovanni da Verrazzano, of Florence, by the order and command of the most Christian King of France."—Winsor: Nar. and Crit. Hist. IV., 18-19.

There are numerous references to Verrazzano's voyage in the early Spanish, Portuguese, French, and English authorities. Among them is a letter from the Portuguese ambassador to France written in the spring of 1523 which shows that Verrazzano had announced his intention of making a voyage to "Cathay." References to the fact that he did actually make such a voyage are found in the writings of historians as early as 1537.—Parkman: The Pioneers of France in the New World, 232. (Note.)

The first suggestion that the letter of July 8, 1524, was not genuine was made by Mr. Buckingham Smith in a paper which he read before the New York Historical Society in October, 1864. This view was further supported by Henry C. Murphy, in his "Voyage of Verrazzano," published in 1875, whose work is the strongest statement of the case against Verrazzano. Its chief importance arises from the fact that it caused Mr. Bancroft to omit any reference to Verrazzano's voyage in his last revision of his "History of the United States."

Justin Winsor reviews the entire controversy in the fourth volume of his "Narrative and Critical History of America," and seems effectually to dispose of the arguments of Mr. Murphy. John Fiske also declares that "Mr. Murphy's conclusions have not been generally sustained."—Discovery of America, II., 493 (Note). Since the publication of Murphy's work, new evidence discovered in European archives still further substantiates the genuineness of the Verrazzano letter, so that at present the conclusion of Francis Parkman appears to represent generally the attitude of modern investigators and historians. Says he, after reviewing the controversy, "A careful examination of these various writings convinces me that the evidence in favor of the voyage of Verrazzano is far stronger than the evidence against it."—Pioneers of France in The New World, 232 (Note).

France at that time was unfavorable. "The year of his voyage," says Parkman, "was to France a year of disasters—defeat in Italy, the loss of Milan, the death of the heroic Bayard; and, while Verrazzano was writing his narrative at Dieppe, the traitor Bourbon was invading Provence. Preparation, too, was soon on foot for the expedition which, a few months later, ended in the captivity of Francis on the field of Pavia. Without a King, without an army, without money, convulsed within, and threatened from without, France after that humiliation was in no condition to renew her transatlantic enterprise."[5]

We know but little of Verrazzano's subsequent career, and his fate is involved in much obscurity. Ramusio states that he was killed and eaten by savages; while Biddle thinks that it is impossible from references in Hakluyt, to withstand the conviction that Verrazzano later entered the service of Henry VIII of England. But the best modern opinion, based on documents recently brought to light, is that, in 1527, he was captured by the Spaniards and condemned and hanged as a pirate. Still, as another writer has said, "All that we know with certainty is, that one great action distinguished him from the mass of adventures, in an age which had produced a Columbus and a Cabot; while doubt and mystery have enveloped the rest of his career, leaving us uncertain whether we should lament the untimely fate which gave him a prey to the barbarous appetite of cannibals, or execrate the ingratitude which compelled him to sacrifice to a struggle with the daily necessities of life, a mind formed for daring and successful adventure."[6]

First Secession Flag

The Raising and Taking Down of the Flag at Ansonville in February, 1861

By General W. A. Smith.

In Ansonville, North Carolina, on the morning of the second of February, 1861, the citizens of the village beheld a flag, whose folds were flapping in the wind blowing from the Southeast betokening rain and brewing up foul, disagreeable weather, foreshadowing dark, impending war clouds.

On and before February 1st, seven States had passed ordinances of secession from the Union, and withdrawn their Congressional delegations from Washington. South Carolina led on December 20, 1860. Mississippi followed January 7, 1861; Florida, January 10, 1861; Alabama, January 11, 1861; Georgia, January 19, 1861; Louisiana, January 26, 1861; Texas, February 1, 1861.

February 1st the electric telegraph flashed over the land that Texas had joined her Southern sisters, which so enthused Adolphus A. Waddell, John B. Waddell, W. A. Threadgill and Jas. M. Wright that they determined to become more active in the cause of secession. These young men of the village were very desirous to have North Carolina follow the seven States, and during the night of February 1st prepared a flag which they hoped would prove an incentive and aid in determining the State of North Carolina to secede from the Union. Having no bunting, they made the flag of calico, with two large stars at the head marked S. C. and Miss., abbreviations for South Carolina and Mississippi, the first two States severing their relations with Washington. From these stars led stripes of alternating red, white and blue; and in the lower corner at the tail end was another star of like proportions half turned down marked N. C., representing North Carolina faint and drooping, hanging her head in dishonor, shame and disgrace. In large letters at the top of the flag was the word "Secession." Underneath was this motto: "Resistance to Oppression is in Obedience to God."

This flag was fashioned in the Garrett store after business hours. On the opposite side of the street was the wooden framework of an unfinished store. The flag, size 6x9 feet was attached to a pole and securely fastened to the studding and rafters forming the comb of this building.

On the morning of the 2nd of February the citizens of the village took notice of this Secession flag which had been given to the breeze during the dark hours of the night. Almost unanimous was the sentiment of opposition. Indignation prevailed and talk of cutting it down freely indulged, the makers not daring to disclose themselves. Two or three ratified the act and commended the unknown makers, and as the day wore on a few were converted, declaring themselves, and were added to the number of Secessionists. Among these was Prof. Gilliam, a teacher in the college, from the State of Virginia. Emboldened by these accessions, the makers of the flag openly avowed their sentiments and their handiwork in fashioning the flag.

Misses Kate Smith and Winnie Watkins made four rosettes of silk and pinned them on the lapels of the makers of the flag, which, said one of them, "made us very proud, and we walked the streets as vain as strutting peacocks."

During the night of the 2nd, Col. John J. Colson and Washington Threadgill climbed to the comb of the storehouse frame, cut the fastenings, and the flag fell to the sidewalk. In descending, Colonel Colson's foot slipped and he fell 10 to 15 feet, with only a slight sprain, landing on his feet. Dr. William A. Ingram, in his office near by, heard the noise and came out to ascertain the cause. Colson, pointing to the flag, said, "We cut down that d——d Secession flag." Doctor Ingram replied, "You did right. It ought not to have been made and put up to insult the intelligence of the community. I'll never tell who did it." He respected his word. This flag was never more seen.

The morning of the 3rd dawned fair. Balmy breezes from the South stirred the hot blood of the young Secessionists of both genders to indignation and contempt of the dastardly act, on finding the flag of their pride torn down and destroyed under the cover of darkness. Undismayed, bunting was procured, taken to the residence of Mrs. Garrett, an enthusiast in the cause of secession. She, assisted by the young ladies of the village, made a larger flag, similar in design, and with like stars and same motto. This flag was unfurled in the afternoon at the same place. Seemingly the destruction of the flag added to the number of Secessionists, for believing in a square deal the people condemned the dastardly act of tearing it down under the cover of darkness. A few walked underneath its folds with hats off, others and far the greater number, would not pass underneath or even allow its shadow to fall on them.

News of the first Secession flag raised and destroyed, and the making of another, larger and of finer material having been made and given to the breeze, was circulated in the country. A large number of citizens assembled in the village the afternoon of the 3d of February, many, very many, approving the destruction of the first flag, taking this one down and tearing "the damn Secession rag to pieces."

One of the makers of the original flag, and the only one now living, from whom many of the facts herein set down were obtained, writing of the occasion, says: "About ten young men fell in with us, all armed with guns, and told the crowd that we would fight for that flag, and this was a free country, and that it should not be torn down." Professor Gilliam was in the crowd, and was called on for a speech. Standing above the crowd, he made a fine, instructive and impressive address in favor of secession, arraigning the North for its aggressions against the South, and their repudiation of the States' rights, for their contempt for the Constitution—that sacred bond of Union—saying: "By the treaty of Paris, made in 1783, England acknowledged the independence of the thirteen colonies by name, and each one became a sovereign, independent State"; that these States entered into a Union forming the United States of America by their own choice and motion, each one reserving its independence, and its State right to withdraw from the Union when laws adverse and hurtful to its welfare should be made by the General Congress; that the Northern States, being commercial and manufacturing, antagonized the agricultural Southern States, whose people were content and prosperous, and therefore envied; that law after law had been enacted inimical to our welfare, encroachment after encroachment was borne by the South, compromise after compromise was broken and nullified by the States of the North, dominated by a party which declared the Constitution—that sacred bond of Union—"was in league with the devil and a covenant of hell"; that our only safety lay in separation and withdrawing from a compact repeatedly broken; that having reserved the right to secede, we would withdraw in peace; that they would not attempt coercion; they would not dare bring on a fratricidal war; they would not dare bring on a war among brothers, for that would mean a war to the knife—a war in which no quarter would be shown; that they would not dare attempt to make vassals of free and independent States.

"No," said he, "we will go in peace and pursue our own ideas of progress and advancement and live under laws enacted by ourselves, conducive to our own interest and to our happiness"; that the North were merchants and shoemakers, who would not fight; they were shade-seekers and counter-jumpers, unacquainted with firearms, inexperienced in horsemanship and manly out-of-door sports; no, they would not dare meet the chivalry of the South on the battlefield. "Isn't the Lord on our side, the side of equity, justice and right? He says in holy writ: 'Five shall chase an hundred, and an hundred shall put ten thousand to flight'; and, again, 'the sound of a leaf shall chase them.' I will drink all the blood shed by the pusillanimous abolitionists." Turning to the little band under arms, he commended the makers of the flag and the heroism behind it, and fully endorsed the motto, "Resistance to oppression is in obedience to God."

He closed with discreet, well-chosen phrases complimentary to those whose patriotic sentiments were opposed to secession and to the raising of the flag, advising calmness and due consideration of the opinion of others who differed with them; advising against rashness and hasty action, counseling due deliberation, and, withal, admonishing them to maintain the dignity of the law and preserve the reputation of the good people of the community by keeping the peace.

His speech had a very happy effect. It emphasized and clarified the intellectual vision of his audience, and one by one they wended their way home with thoughtful mien and contemplative spirit.

Nevertheless, the flag was guarded that night and every night until the sentiment against it had cooled down. Day by day accessions were made of those of secession aspiration and patriotic sentiments. No further attempts were made against the flag.

Cheered only by the smiles of the young ladies and daily accessions of young manhood, the Secessionists proposed placing the flag in a more conspicuous position. By permission of Colonel Colson (they knew not that he had cut down and destroyed the first flag), they procured from his land a very tall, beautifully straight, but small pine, upward of 80 feet long. The bark was peeled off and the long tapering white pole was raised in front of the college building amidst the jibes of observers on the one hand, and the cheers of the many boy participants on the other. The flag was then run up to the top of the pole by the young hot-bloods with no thought that it foreshadowed four long years of disastrous war and devastation of the fair Southland. The older and old men did not approve of the sentiments typified by this secession flag. They deemed it wrong, rash and inconsiderate. Col. William G. Smith, William Little, Dr. John B. Cortrell and others spoke their disapproval of this exhibition of disloyalty to the Union. These old gentlemen thoroughly believed in the right of a State to withdraw from the Union, a right guaranteed North Carolina by the Congress of the United States before she entered the Union, but did not think secession the proper remedy to correct the wrongs which the North was perpetrating against the South and the whole body politic. Therefore, these men opposed the raising of this secession flag by the hot-headed, fire-eating boys, who gave little heed to the counsel of the old and no thought to the responsibilities of the future. These older men said: "Fight for our rights if needs must, but fight in the Union, under the flag made glorious by the blood of our Revolutionary fathers—the flag of love and veneration—the stars and stripes." Had their advice been taken and followed, the North would not have been able to stir the hearts of their people so profoundly and rouse them to unanimity against the South by the heartrending but courageous cry, "The Union and Old Glory Forever."

Early in February the question of calling a convention for the purpose of passing an ordinance of secession was defeated by the people by a majority of 30,000, indisputable evidence that the prevailing sentiment in North Carolina was for the Union. When President Lincoln called for troops to coerce the seceeding States back into the Union, and the question again submitted, it was ratified almost unanimously; for he was transcending his authority, attempting to force an independent State and free people to live under laws inimical to their welfare. Sentiment crystalizes rapidly in times of great excitement, even on questions of momentous issue.

On the 20th of May North Carolina elected to stand with her sister Southern States in defense of her rights by passing the ordinance of secession. Then the turned down star, representing North Carolina, was displayed in full; complete, strong and clear. As one man her sons sprang to arms and attested her devotion by giving 130,000 of her bravest to the cause, more than 40,000 of whom never came back, whose blood flowed out, enriched and made sacred the soil of many States. From the war records we know more men fell in battle from North Carolina than from any three other States, a fact of pride, not of boast. The secession of North Carolina was preceded by Virginia, April 17, 1861; by Arkansas May 6, 1861, and followed by Tennessee June 5, 1861.

When the Anson Guards, which was the first company in the State to offer its services to Governor Ellis, left for the front this secession flag was committed to John Birdsong Waddell, a member of said company, to be by him presented to Governor Ellis. John Birdsong Waddell was the great grandson of John Birdsong, of Chatham County, who was noted for his patriotism in the day "that tried men's souls," was prominent in the councils of the colony. He was a delegate at Hillsboro, August 21, 1775, and member of Congress at Halifax November 12, 1776.

Search among the State archives so far has failed to find this flag. This is not surprising, however, considering an army under General William T. Sherman, famed by the devastated homes on his march to the sea, evidenced by the blackened chimneys standing as monuments amid waste and desolation wrought by his army.

The sentiment against the secession flag, sometimes designated "Secesh" flag, was violent and uncompromising. Many would not walk under its folds nor allow its shadows to fall on them, often crossing the street to avoid the possibility of being contaminated thereby. These were probably actuated by similar feelings which animated the ladies of New Orleans, who refused to walk under the Federal flag displayed by the order of B. F. Butler, known to the South and to history as "Beast" Butler and "Spoon" Butler. Sam Christian, a prominent citizen, drove five miles out of his way going to Wadesboro, the county's capital, rather than pass underneath its folds; and the Reverend William (Uncle Billy) Knight refused to visit the village during his life because of his dislike and contempt for the secession sentiment manifested by "that hole," as he expressed it. In the language of the only one of the immortal four now living, "Old Aunt Polly Ingram came to Ansonville to shop. She always traded with me. On entering the store she noticed the beautiful rosette on my coat lapel and she blessed me out and took herself across the street to Garrett's store. There she saw W. A. Threadgill with a rosette on. In no gentle language she gave him a piece of her mind, and out she came. Indignant and in disgust, she left the village and drove to Wadesboro, ten miles distant, and did her shopping."

The North Carolina Booklet

Vol. XVII JULY, 1917 No. 1

A Federalist of the Old School

By Archibald Henderson.

"The most perfect model of a lawyer that our bar has produced."
Archibald DeBow Murphey.

I.

Some years ago, Colonel Richard Benbury Creecy in a fascinating article entitled, "Our Old Lawyers," expressed the wish that some writer might "place his State and its coming sons under a debt of gratitude to him" by preparing "an elaborate memorial of the great lawyer, Archibald Henderson, who for many years led a profession in North Carolina, which has always been foremost in its annals and its patriotic work." The obituary which was published by his friend, Judge Archibald D. Murphey, presents in classic form and high relief his character as publicist. "I venture to think," says a distinguished jurist,* "that we have had no finer setting forth of the qualities of a great lawyer and citizen, his relations to his profession, the court and the public, than the essay of Judge Murphey on Mr. Henderson." Diligent research has demonstrated, nevertheless, that no consecutive or detailed biography of Archibald Henderson has ever appeared in print. Memorials of him linger only in that dim region of tradition, where lies obscure so much of North Carolina's past.

The present monograph, slight though it be, has been undertaken in the attempt to supply in some measure an answer to the wish expressed by the late Colonel Creecy. Nothing more is attempted than to enable the reader to see this man as he was viewed by his contemporaries. Authentic biography alone can achieve the miracle of illuminating the past with the search light of truth and throwing into just perspective the temperament, character and genius of those who have lived memorably. Perhaps no one, save he were prompted by sentiments of filial respect, would have attempted a task which offered so many difficulties, especially to one not of the legal profession, and promised so little in tangible results after the lapse of a century. While this brief biography falls far short of the "elaborate memorial," of which Colonel Creecy spoke, it at least sets forth in ordered form and truthful narrative the story, in so far as that story may at this late day be rescued from the past, of the life of a man whose name was once known in North Carolina.

II.

That daring spirit of adventure and the passion for exploration which drove the early settlers of America to plunge into the wilderness and to press resolutely westward across the continent, was but the natural expression of the inquisitive and acquisitive instincts which brought Captain John Smith to Jamestown in 1607, and ultimately gave to this continent the inestimable blessings of civilization, freedom, and religious liberty. One of these early adventurers in trying a daring hazard of new fortunes upon the American continent bore the name of Thomas Henderson. He emigrated to Jamestown from the neighborhood of Dumfries, Scotland, and settled near Williamsburg, Virginia, in the early years of the seventeenth century. Somewhat later he removed to a settlement known as Yellow Springs near Jamestown. Here he fixed his residence, was married, and became in time the father of a family of children. One of his sons, Richard, was married to Margaret Washer, believed to have been the daughter of Ensign Washer, who, together with Captain

Christopher Lawne, represented in the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1619 Captain Lawne's Plantation, afterwards known as "Isle of Wight Plantation."* Richard Henderson subsequently removed to Hanover County, Virginia, where he and his wife reared a family of children: one daughter, who was married to a Mr. Trevelyan and emigrated to South Carolina; and four sons, Edward, Samuel, Nathaniel, and Leonard.

One of these sons, Samuel, who was born in Hanover County on March 17, 1700, passed the first period of his life in this section made famous in later years through the perfervid oratory of Patrick Henry and the devoted ministrations of the Rev. Samuel Davies. Among his neighbors was the demure young girl, Elizabeth Williams, whose father, John Williams, born on January 26, 1679, was a prosperous emigrant from Wales. Mary, Elizabeth's mother, who was born on September 26, 1684, reared a family of eight children of whom Elizabeth was the sixth. No recollections of the courtship of Elizabeth Williams by Samuel Henderson are preserved; yet the sentiment of the bride is expressed in the pretty incident that she insisted that the day of her coming of age, her eighteenth birthday, November 14, 1732, should be her wedding day. At their home, simple as the times, the young couple lived the sane and frugal life characteristic of the period in Virginia.

About the year 1740, Samuel Henderson with his family emigrated to Edgecombe County, North Carolina. They were among the very earliest settlers in that region. This section, known as Nutbush, from the creek of that name which ran through it, was so called, says William Byrd, "from the many hazle trees growing upon it." Some idea of the beauty of the country is conveyed by Byrd's description of the site of their camp four miles from Nutbush Creek, where the North Carolina-Virginia dividing line crossed Great Creek. "The Tent was pitched upon an Eminence, which overlooked a wide Piece of low Grounds, cover'd with Reeds and watered by a Crystal Stream gliding thro' the Middle of it. On the Other Side of this delightful Valley, which was about a half a Mile wide, rose a Hill that terminated the View, and in the figure of a Semicircle closed in upon the opposite Side of the Valley. This had a most agreeable Effect upon the Eye, and wanted nothing but Cattle grazing in the Meadow, and Sheep and Goats feeding on the Hill, to make it a Compleat Rural LANDSCAPE." Little more than a decade after the vision of this "compleat rural landscape" dawned upon Byrd's lively imagination, the fancy became a reality with the coming to this beautiful country of the Hendersons, the Williamses, and the Bullocks from Virginia. When Byrd penned these words, the buffalo still roamed at will through the canebrakes of Craven; skilful hunters, like "Epaphroditus Bainton, the famous Woodsman," spent all their time in ranging the woods and making "great Havock among the Deer, and other inhabitants of the Forest, not much wilder than themselves"; and the Virginia and Carolina traders, following the course of the Great Trading Path and crossing the Yadkin at the Trading Ford, finally reached the towns of the Catawba Indians, whom they supplied with "Guns, Powder, Shot, Hatchets, (which the Indians call Tomahawks,) Kettles, red & blue Planes, Duffields, Stroudwater blankets, and some Cutlary Wares, Brass Rings and other Trinkets."*

In 1733, Edgecombe County was erected out of Craven County by Governor Burrington and Council. So rapid, however, was the emigration from Virginia into this section during the period after 1740 that in 1746 a new county, named Granville in honor of John Carteret, Earl Granville, and a new parish, named St. John's Parish, were erected out of Edgecombe. The reason assigned in the act is: "Edgecomb being a frontier county, is now so extensively settled, that the public business of the said County and Parish becomes very difficult to be transacted."* In the South Carolina Gazette, of March 8, 1768, it is stated: "A letter from Williamsburgh, Virginia, dated October 18, 1767, says: There is scarce a history, ancient or modern, which affords such a rapid and sudden increase of inhabitants in a back frontier country as that of North Carolina." Within a decade, Granville's population rose from nothing to some three thousand; and in 1746 the courts were organized. One of the very first in the county convened at the house of Mr. William Eaton, at which were present Doctor James Payne, John Martin, Gideon Macon, Samuel Henderson, Justices, March 3, 1746 (O. S.). For many years Samuel Henderson served as Justice of the County Court; and on March 6, 1754, he received his commission from the Governor of the Province, Arthur Dobbs, as High Sheriff of Granville County. His assistant in the office in the capacity of sous-sheriff was his eldest son, Richard, who was born in Hanover County, Virginia, on April 20, 1735.

III.

Richard Henderson's son, Archibald, whose life and career here especially engage our interest, was born in Granville County, North Carolina, on August 7, 1768. From his father, the pioneer and expansionist, President of the Colony of Transylvania, founder of Boonesborough and Nashville, he doubtless directly inherited the legal acumen and forensic brilliance which elevated Richard Henderson at the age of thirty-three to the highest court in the colony, and won for him the title of the "Patrick Henry of North Carolina." An English contemporary and acquaintance, in speaking of Richard Henderson's practice and advocacy as a lawyer in the North Carolina Superior Court, pays him this elevated tribute: "Even there, where oratory and eloquence are as brilliant and powerful as in Westminster Hall, he soon became distinguished and eminent, and his superior genius shone forth with great splendor and universal applause." From his mother,

*State Records of North Carolina, XXIII, 249.

Elizabeth, the daughter of an Irish nobleman, Lord George Kelynge, Archibald derived that refreshing simplicity of manner and dignity of demeanor which were signal traits of his personality.

On January 1, 1780, the admirable boarding school in Warren (old Bute) County, known as Springer College, threw open its doors. The number of pupils was thirty; the terms were £100 a year, Virginia money, for tuition, £200 a year for board, and £14-6s-0d paid "towards the schoolhouse, firewood, &c."* This famous academy, situated in an ideal spot and healthy locality, drew pupils from points as distant as Edenton. In this select school Archibald Henderson received his early training; and among his schoolmates were John Haywood, afterwards famous as lawyer, jurist, and historian of Tennessee, and Robert Goodloe Harper, afterwards the distinguished Federalist, Henderson's colleague in Congress, and one of the ablest political leaders of his day. With a touch of quiet humor, Judge W. H. Battle in his Memoir of Leonard Henderson, Archibald's brother, makes the following observation upon the conditions of rural life in North Carolina in that early day: "It may not be amiss to mention here, as an evidence of the simplicity and frugality of the times, as well as of the prudence and industry of the matrons of that day that his mother, though the wife of one of the highest officers of the province, taught her eldest sons, as well as her daughters, to card and spin. Why Leonard was not instructed in the same housewifely accomplishment we are not informed. The splendid professional career of one of his elder brothers, Archibald, shows that though it might not have advanced, it certainly would not have obstructed his upward course to fame and fortune."†

Following the example, and no doubt the counsel of his father, Archibald Henderson studied law under his close relative, Judge John Williams. In the unusually fine library for that day of Judge Williams, a library especially rich in legal literature, he acquired a love of biography, history, and general literature. His preceptor was pronounced by the courtly James Iredell "one of the most agreeable men in the world"; and Elkanah Watson, after speaking of "the elegant seat of Judge Williams, at Nutbush," which he visited in 1786, describes Judge Williams as "an accomplished gentleman, possessing high talents, and genuine Southern hospitality."*

IV.

The distinguished jurist, Spruce Macay, remembered conspicuously as the legal preceptor of two of North Carolina's greatest men, William Richardson Davie and Andrew Jackson, was married to Archibald Henderson's sister, Fanny, in Granville County on May 27, 1785. It was through his influence that Archibald Henderson was induced to remove to Rowan and begin there the practice of the law. As a youth in Salisbury, whither he removed from Granville about 1790, he has been described by his acquaintance of that period, the singular genius, Dr. Charles Caldwell. In the matured opinion of Caldwell, recorded in later life, Archibald Henderson was "possessed of splendid talents and commanding eloquence." He has left the following interesting and graphic pen-picture of Henderson as a young man:

"Classically and carefully educated from his boyhood, he was a man of fine literary taste, an excellent Shakespeare scholar, and well versed in English poetry in general; especially in that of the highest order.

"Instead of joining clubs, to eat, drink, joke, and frolic, as most of the other men of Salisbury did, he and myself met on stated evenings in our studies, to read, converse on, and criticise specified works in polite literature, and sometimes manuscript articles of our own production. And, from that source, we derived not only rational and high gratification, but also valuable improvement in letters."*

The town of Salisbury in 1786, as described by Elkanah Watson, was "a pleasant village, containing fifty dwelling houses. . . . The road to Charlotte, in Mecklenburg County, was equal to any English turnpike and traversed a beautiful level." The population shortly after the time of Archibald Henderson's removal thither is given by George Washington in his Diary (1791) as "about three hundred souls . . . and tradesmen of different kinds"; and an indication of its gracious social culture is given in Washington's words: "Dined at a public dinner (May 30, 1791) givn. by the Citizens of Salisbury; & in the afternoon drank Tea at the same place with about 20 ladies, who had been assembled for the occasion." Distinguished figures in the social circle in Salisbury, in which Archibald Henderson moved, were General John Steele, sometime Representative in Congress and later Comptroller General of the Currency under Washington, Adams, and Jefferson; General Matthew Locke, of titled ancestry, who represented the district in the third, fourth, and fifth Congresses; Judge Spruce Macay, who presided over the Western Circuit, determined and fearless in discharging the difficult duties of his office; Dr. Samuel Eusebius McCorkle, graduate of Princeton, eminent Presbyterian divine and famous teacher; Maxwell Chambers, Commissioner of the Borough; William Lee Alexander, student at Nassau Hall and veteran of the Revolution; Captain John Beard and Lewis Beard, prominent citizens who had been Revolutionary soldiers; the able Adlai Osborne, and Dr. Charles Caldwell, afterwards eminent as physician and teacher.

Archibald Henderson displayed the most genial interest in the development of the ambitious young men of his acquaintance in Rowan. In particular, he freely extended to them the benefits of the admirable and carefully selected library which he began early to collect. In an authoritative account of his own career, prepared under his immediate supervision, John Hardy Steele, who was born in Salisbury and in middle life became Governor of New Hampshire, pays him the following graceful tribute of gratitude:

"Young Steele's mother being a widow, and in straightened circumstances, he had no time for the amusements common to childhood, and but little for study and reading. He is greatly indebted to Archibald Henderson, Esq., at this time and for years after a successful and highly esteemed lawyer, for a taste for reading and a thirst for practical knowledge, which has been not less remarkable in after life than his thorough devotion to the sterner labors, which he was never known to neglect. The Governor has been often heard to say that there are no more pleasant and grateful recollections connected with the trying years of his early life, than those which cluster around the office and ample library of Mr. Henderson, where a benevolent smile and word of encouragement were always sure to greet him."*

V.

During the closing decade of the eighteenth century, while he was forging to the forefront of the legal profession in North Carolina, Archibald Henderson was rapidly developing those mental powers which caused him to be described by the late Col. R. B. Creecy as "the foremost advocate and orator at our bar." After his first removal to Salisbury and a sojourn of a few years there until 1795, he returned to Granville, where he served as Clerk and Master in Equity of the County Court in 1795-6-7-8. In 1798 he once more removed to Rowan and made Salisbury his permanent home.

There is no record of any likeness of him having ever been made. He would doubtless have regarded such a thing as a weak concession to personal vanity. From the personal reminiscences of his acquaintances, we know that he was a large man physically, with noble forehead, aquiline nose, compressed lips, firm-set jaws, somewhat elongated chin, and an open countenance kindly and benignant in expression. "Rhetorical," "winning," "ready," eloquent," and "effective" are the precise adjectives which his acquaintances have employed to describe his qualities as an advocate. Endowed with the temperamental geniality which distinguished his father, he readily won the good-will as well as the admiration of his acquaintances. His wide popularity was in no small measure due to his firm belief, frequently expressed and habitually put into practice, in the wisdom of "forming an intimate acquaintance with mankind, and particularly with the middle and lower classes of people, their passions, feelings, prejudices, modes of thinking and motives of action."

Before the age of thirty, he came to be widely known, not only in the Salisbury District, but throughout the State, as an ardent Federalist. For Washington he cherished boundless reverence; the brilliant qualities of Burr excited his profound admiration; and Adams found in him a staunch adherent. With strong and outspoken convictions, he quickly became a marked man; and he was urgently petitioned by his friends to present himself as a candidate for Congress—a step not a little contrary to his natural inclination. Pitted against an able opponent, the Hon. Matthew Locke, who had served as Representative in Congress since 1792, he was elected to Congress at the age of thirty in the summer of 1798. The following letter from President Adams to General John Steele furnishes an interesting, if brief, comment on the political situation:

Quincy Sept 4 1798

Sir

I have recd your favour of Aug. 29 inclosing the Resolutions and Address of Bladen County in N. Carolina. A more excellent address has not appeared. A few words in answer I return to you with the Address that you may publish them in the Papers, if you please.

The Election of Mr. Henderson is very honourable to him and his Constituents. If the inveterate Phalanx should be broken our Country will triumph.

With sincere Esteem I have the honor to be Sir your obliged servant

JOHN ADAMS.

John Steele Esqr.
Comptroller of the Treasury at Trenton.

At this election five other men were elected as Federalists from North Carolina: William Barry Grove, Joseph Dickson, William H. Hill, Richard Dobbs Spaight, and David Stone. The Hon. Charles Lee, Member of Congress from Virginia, writing to James Iredell in September, 1798, observes: "The change in North Carolina is most pleasing, and with so good an example before Virginia, I trust this State will amend her representation also." The North Carolina Federalists won a signal success in electing as Governor of the State the distinguished William R. Davie, who was inaugurated on January 1, 1799. This triumph of Federalism in North Carolina was to prove but short-lived; the star of Jefferson and Democracy was steadily rising. On this account, it is especially deserving of remark that the strong Federalist rally in Western North Carolina was principally due to the powerful personal influence of Archibald Henderson. A cooperative influence was the recrudescence of the historic antagonism of the whole western portion of the State to the political domination of the "East."

VI.

On December 2, 1799, Mr. Henderson appeared at Philadelphia, presented his credentials, and took his seat at this, the first session of the sixth Congress of the United States. He carried to Philadelphia with him his attractive little niece, who afterwards became the wife of the Hon. William C. Love, of Salisbury. In token of his solicitude for the little Elizabeth Macay, his sister Fanny's daughter, these words from a letter to Spruce Macay, her father, of March 23, 1800, are deserving of quotation: "I am now sitting in my chamber with Betsy at my side. She is very well and has made handsome progress in her studies. I have frequently taken her to the theatre, and it would astonish you to see how she is pleased with the performances. I had anticipated your wishes in placing her to a dancing school before the receipt of your letter. I propose to set off with her to Bethlehem next Saturday week." Doubtless Betsy was placed in some noted school, perhaps under Moravian control, at Bethlehem.

From the very beginning of his term in Congress, Mr. Henderson exhibited a lively interest in public questions and busied himself actively in the duties of his office. On December 5, 1799, he was appointed a member of the important Committee of Elections; and on January 13, 1800, he was designated a member of the committee instructed to examine into the political system by which the Mississippi territory was governed. The subject which especially engaged his attention was the reform of the judiciary system then under consideration. This matter had been forcibly brought to his attention when President Adams, in addressing the Congress upon its opening (December 3), had impressively said: "To give due effect to the civil administration of government, and to ensure a just execution of the laws, a revision and amendment of the judiciary system is indispensibly necessary. In this extensive country it cannot but happen that numerous questions respecting the interpretation of the laws of the rights and duties of officers and citizens must arise. On the one hand, the laws should be executed; on the other, individuals should be guarded from oppression. Neither of these objects is sufficiently assured, under the present organization of the judicial department." On December 9, the question of "a revision and amendment of the judiciary system" was referred to a committee with leave to report by bill; and the general problem of the better establishment and regulation of the courts of the United States assumed great importance at this and the next session of Congress. The committee consisted of Mr. Robert Goodloe Harper, of South Carolina; Mr. Chauncey Goodrich, of Connecticut; Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware; Mr. John Marshall, of Virginia; and Mr. Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts.

In speaking of the discussion set for March 24, 1800—at which time the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House on the bill—Henderson writes to Macay:

"We shall enter upon the consideration of the Judiciary Bill tomorrow. Those persons who are best informed are of opinion it will not pass at this session of Congress. I am fearful it will not, but I think the chance by no means desperate. We have a number of gentlemen here who do not make the expediency and propriety of a measure proposed the rule of their political conduct, but are calculating what effect the plan proposed will have on the people. They will acknowledge that the thing itself is wholesome and necessary for the publick good but they are apprehensive that the sovereign people will not be pleased. I confess for my own part that I am tired of this dismal clamor about the people. I respect them as much as any man but I am not for sacrificing my own judgment and opinion together with their essential interest to the intemperate howlings of a few demagogues. I believe that the dearest Interests of our Country require that a radical change be made in the mode of administering Justice. That change will no doubt create some additional expense at which the popular leaders of the day will eagerly lay hold of to render the measure odious. I conceive myself legislating on this important occasion not for the pursuit of only bare popularity. It is of the utmost importance to the interest of America that it should establish a system of administering Justice which will secure a speedy and impartial determination of causes brought into the courts and which will make the expense incident to litigation as small as possible. I am of the opinion that the plan proposed is the result of deep reflection and much labor, and is admirably calculated to promote these desirable objects."

On Friday, March 28, after several sessions of the committee of the whole House, the bill was re-committed to the original committee. The bill which was reported by this committee became the foundation of the act that was adopted in 1801.

VII.

It was Mr. Henderson's fixed intention to return to the practice of the law, to which his genius was best suited, at the expiration of his first term in Congress. In pursuance of this intention, he published the following notice in The North Carolina Mercury and Salisbury Advertiser, issue of June 5, 1800, and several succeeding issues:

To the Citizens of the counties of Rowan, Iredell, Mecklenburg, Cabarrus and Montgomery.

Gentlemen,

A period is fast approaching when you will be called upon to elect from among yourselves, a person to represent you in the next Congress of the United States. And as it may be supposed that I shall again offer my services unless a declaration to the contrary is made, I feel myself bound thus early to inform you that I shall not be a Candidate at the ensuing Congressional Election. It is not necessary that I should detail the reasons which have led to this determination; I assure you Gentlemen, that they have not originated in a want of a due appreciation of the distinguished honor you have conferred on me in a measure so flattering, nor from disinclination to devote my time to the service of a people whose peace and happiness are the first wish of my heart.

I have the honor to be,
Gentlemen,
with great respect,
Your most obedient,
humble servant,

A. HENDERSON.

Philadelphia, 15th April, 1800.

The candidates for the seat were Mr. Henderson's competitor in 1798, the Hon. Matthew Locke, and a Mr. Mussendine Matthews, who for ten years had represented Iredell County in the lower house of the General Assembly. In the above-mentioned newspaper, issue of June 12, appeared a letter signed "A Country Farmer's Son," urging the election of Locke:

"At a time as critical as the present, my fellow-citizens, we ought to be extreamly cautious who we elect to fill that important trust. We ought to send the man prone to virtue, the man of experience, and the man of sense. Let us state a question with regard to Mr. Locke. Is not he the Gentleman possessed of these charming qualifications? Yes certainly he is. Has he not served his country in the General Assembly of this state almost ever since the American war until the year '93? Since that until Aug. 4, 1799, he has served in a higher capacity, viz. a member of Congress six (?) successive elections he was the choice of the people, and by his goodness and wisdom conducted so, as not to merit a frown from a single individual. At the election of '98, when Archibald Henderson, Esq., opposed Mr. Locke, and for sentiments, and policy, which ought to have done our representative immortal honour, he was ousted from an office which he had served with dignity and unfeigned goodness. But such is human nature—not long contented with the same, as fond to elect him in, and as apt to elect him out. A number of the ignorant were under a gross mistake with regard to Mr. Locke's politics. They supposed him a friend to the French and its government in defiance to his own."

This unknown champion highly praised the "wisdom, experience and virtue" of Mr. Locke, and vehemently repelled the insinuation that he had been a "traitor to his country."

In explanation of the grounds for his candidacy, Mr. Locke issued an "Address to the freemen of the Counties of Rowan, Iredell, Cabarrus, Mecklenburg and Montgomery," saying among other things:

"I declare myself a real friend to the Federal government, and a zealous defender of the Constitution, which I have often sworn to support, but do not implicitly rely upon a belief that all the present measures of Government have been wisely adopted, and impartially administered; but do believe that millions of dollars have been expended that ought to have been saved."

He declared his consistent opposition to all measures which have "a tendency, unnecessarily to oppress the citizens or enslave posterity," and expressed the belief that "on a fair investigation of my political conduct, whilst in your service, I shall stand acquitted from the calumny raised against me in my absence, to which I impute the result of my last unsuccessful attempt."

The reasons which actuated Mr. Henderson to reconsider his original decision not to be a candidate are set forth by him in a letter to Mr. Walter Alves of Hillsborough (July 28, 1800), recently discovered. Clearly the desire to strengthen the Federalist party was the controlling motive in his final decision. For in the perfervid language expressive of the vehement political feeling of the time, he says to Alves: "Let us, my dear Sir, exert ourselves not only to save our common Country from impending ruin but to raise our own state from that low point of depression to which she has been sunk by the acts of factious and designing men. Every vote which Jefferson will get in this state is a blot upon our reputation." More explicitly concerning his own candidacy he says:

"Since my return I have been prevailed upon by the solicitations of a number of respected men in this district to suffer my name to be held up as a candidate for a seat in the next Congress. I am opposed by Matthews and Locke. It is supposed by my friends that I shall be elected; for my own part, I think it doubtful. The district is Federal and would have elected me by a large majority had it not been for the public declaration which I made, expressive of my intention to decline to hold a poll. This circumstance, together with that of General Smith* having offered his service and then withdrawing in my favor, are taken hold of by my opponents and managed with much dexterity to my disadvantage."

The return of the poll, as published in Francis Coupee's newspaper of August 21, was as follows:

During the closing months of John Adams' administration there was passed (February 13, 1801) the act known as the Circuit Court Act or the Judiciary Act of 1801. The necessity for relieving the justices of the Supreme Court from the arduous duties incurred in riding the circuit had been urged for a decade. It was vigorously maintained by the Republicans that the amount of business before the courts of the United States had actually begun to decline; and it was therefore urged by them that the increased expenditure provided for was not warranted by existent conditions. The charge was forcibly made that the enlargement of the judiciary "was only effected for the purpose of keeping the Federalists in control of the judiciary for a long time to come." Adams came in for severe censure, both for the character of the appointments and the making of "midnight appointments" during the closing hours of his term of office. While the number of districts having a court presided over by a district judge was increased from seventeen to twenty-two, no provision was made for the appointment of new judges. Sixteen additional judgeships were provided for under this act—three each in five of the six circuits into which the twenty-two districts were classed, and one in the remaining district. Instead of involving an additional cost of $137,000, as assumed in the later debates on the judiciary act, the sixteen new judgeships represented an increase of less than $50,000.* The Republicans certainly had some ground for the feeling that the increased expenditure was unnecessary; and factional feeling ran high over the uniformly partisan character of the appointments. Mr. Henderson, who fully endorsed the measure, says in a printed "Letter to his Constituents," issued from Washington, February 28, 1801:

"By the late judiciary system, the judges of the supreme court were required to hold, in every year, two courts at the seat of government, and two courts in each of the states. To perform this duty, it was necessary for them to be almost continually traveling; they had no time for study and reflection, and the fatigue was so great, that it is impossible for men advanced in life, to continue long equal to the task. It was found that we must either drive from our service the most able and experienced men in the nation, or so modify our judicial system as to make it less burdensome to the judges. When we reflect that all which is dear to man, his liberty, his property, his reputation, are placed in the hands of the judges—when we reflect that the character of the nation is intimately connected with the prudence and ability of its courts, it is confidently believed, that few men can be found who will hesitate to say that it is of the first importance that this high trust should be confided to men pre-eminent for talents and virtue. It is moreover to be observed, that under the former system, some of the districts were so large as to render it very inconvenient and expensive for suitors, jurors, &c., to attend the courts. This evil has, in some measure, been remedied by dividing the large districts. The law divides the United States into six circuits; in each of those circuits three judges are to be appointed, who are called circuit judges, and are to hold courts twice a year in each district in their respective circuits. In all cases above the sum of 2,000 dollars, an appeal lies to the supreme court, which is to set twice a year at the seat of government. This court is to be composed of the present judges of the supreme court, who are not to perform any circuit duties, but are to try all cases where, by the constitution of the United States, the supreme court has original jurisdiction, and appeals which may be brought up from the inferior courts. Courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction are established in the several districts. In the district of North Carolina they are to be holden at three different places, three times a year, to wit: at

It certainly merits the attention of every American Patriot." See also Max Farrand: "The Judiciary Act of 1801," American Historical Review, V, 682-6.

Wilmington, Newbern, and Edenton. This duty, in most cases, is to be performed by the district judges, though in some instances the circuit judges will hold admiralty and circuit courts. This is an outline of this important law—and I am sure that the additional expense will be cheerfully paid by the people of the United States, when they consider the immense advantage of having an able, pure and impartial administration of justice, and that to attain this great object throughout our extensive country, a considerable expense must necessarily result."

IX.

The first great national issue in Congress which Henderson was called upon to meet arose in connection with the famous conjuncture over the tie between Jefferson and Burr, which was announced to both Houses on February 11, 1801. Whereas both men were professed Democrats, Burr was believed by the Federalists to be far nearer in spirit to them than his political designation would indicate. Moreover, they believed him to be possessed of sufficient ambition to prompt him to accept with complacency the office of the presidency at the hands of his political opponents. Writing from Washington to Walter Alves of Hillsborough on January 2, 1801, Henderson interestingly sets forth the views of the Federalists at this critical juncture:

"You have learned that Jefferson and Burr have an equal number of votes. The great business of making a President devolves upon the house of Representatives. The Federalists view the election of Jefferson as the most serious evil which can happen to America. In fact I am every day more and more convinced that he is altogether unqualified to be at the head of a great nation. I assure you Sir that it is impossible to give you a correct idea of the serious and alarming state of things. The friends of order, religion, and government fear that all is lost and that America is to see another proof of the fallibility of Republican governments. We mean to make a stand and endeavor to elect Burr. He is not our choice, but we think him infinitely preferable to Jefferson. He is a bold, practical, energetic politician of great talents and unbounded ambition—and is at heart no democrat."

Considerable excitement prevailed throughout the country during the course of the long intrigue and the series of successive ballots that were taken. In the event, there was a general feeling of satisfaction—the conviction that substantial justice had been done—when Jefferson was finally elected, by ten States, on the thirty-sixth ballot. On the first ballot, the vote of North Carolina was cast for Jefferson; and three of the Federalists from North Carolina voted for Jefferson. After the first ballot, the North Carolina Federalists generally voted for Burr. It has been stated, in authoritative publications, that Henderson, although elected as a Federalist, supported Jefferson for President.* Nothing could be further from the truth. After describing in detail the progress of the balloting, Henderson says in a letter to his constituents:

"The federalists supported col. Burr, and the democrats Mr. Jefferson; it is known that neither of those gentlemen are acceptable to the federalists; but of the two they prefer col. Burr.

"The supporters of Jefferson declared they would continue to vote for him until the 4th of March, and risque the consequence of having no President, or in other words, that they would dissolve the government if the man of their choice were not chosen. The federalists think that a weak and inefficient government is better than no government at all, and preferred having Mr. Jefferson President, exceptionable as he is, to anarchy and confusion. It is certainly my duty to inform you, and from it I shall not shrink, that through the whole of this transaction, I uniformly voted for col. Burr. I did so under a conviction that he was the best qualified of the two candidates to promote the honor, peace and happiness of the nation. I shall forbear to say what I think of Mr. Jefferson; he is now on the eve of being chief magistrate of the nation; respect for the office he is to fill, and not for the man, forbids me to make any comments on his character. It is possible that I may have formed a false estimate of his worth. A few years will convince the American people, whether those who have heretofore conducted their national affairs merit their confidence and esteem, or not."

Archibald Henderson's most conspicuous achievement during the period of his congressional service, which came in his second term, was his speech on the repeal of the Federal Judiciary Act, delivered in the House of Representatives on February 16, 1802. The indignation of the Republicans over the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1801 found vigorous expression at the very beginning of Jefferson's administration. As early as March 16, 1801, William Branch Giles, of Virginia, advised Jefferson that "the only check upon the judiciary system as it is now organized and filled, is the removal of all its executive officers indiscriminately." Again, on June 1, he informed Jefferson that, in his judgment, "no remedy" was "competent to redress the evil, but an absolute repeal of the whole judiciary system, terminating the present offices, and creating an entire new system defining the common law doctrine, and restraining to the proper Constitutional extent the jurisdiction of the courts."* The most powerful demand for the repeal of the act came from Kentucky; and John Breckinridge, who then represented Kentucky in the United States Senate, was deluged with letters from his constituents, urging a change in the judiciary system. Upon his solicitation, the brilliant John Taylor of Caroline, set forth at length, in a private letter recently published, the arguments which became the basis of the repeal of the act of 1801.†

Because of his signal ability as an advocate, his great eloquence, and his reputation as a student of constitutional law, Archibald Henderson was chosen to lead the debate for the Federalists, among whom were such distinguished figures as James A. Bayard, of Delaware, and Roger Griswold, of Connecticut. The argument foreshadowing the outlines of Henderson's speech are tersely expressed in his letter to Samuel Johnston, a leading North Carolina Federalist, of January 24, 1802:

"The Independence of our Judges is about to be destroyed and the Constitution of our Country trampled under foot. The Law passed at the last session of Congress for the better organization of the Courts will be repealed and the Judges stript of their office. If any one political truth has been established by experience it is that life and property can only be safe under a system of Government, in which the Judges are placed above the influence, which results from a dependence on the will of others for their continuance in office. No part of the Constitution is expressed in more simple, plain and appropriate language than that which establishes this independence. How daring then, how criminally daring must that hand be which to gratify the spirit of Party and to satiate revenge can pollute the sacred Charter containing this principle so replete with human happiness and so admired by the wise and virtuous of all nations?"

Mr. Henderson's speech on the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801 was one of the "selections" in the Readers used by school children in the South in ante-bellum days; and it was often chosen as a subject for declamation in the school exercises. This speech has been described by the biographer of Nathaniel Macon as "the ablest speech that had ever been offered by a North Carolinian on the floor of Congress."* So powerful was the impression produced in Congress by this speech that it drew from Nathaniel Macon, a North Carolinian of the opposite party, the longest and most representative speech ever delivered by him in the course of his extended political career. In regard to the action of the North Carolina Assembly, in instructing its Senators and recommending to its Representatives to have the Judiciary Act of 1801 repealed, Henderson resolutely proclaimed his refusal to be instructed, averring that he did not pray "thy will, not mine, be done" to the North Carolina Assembly. Professor Dodd describes the closing remarks of his speech as "worthy of Fisher Ames." In speaking of Henderson's public career, Dr. Charles Caldwell says: "He once allowed himself to be elected a representative to Congress, where he greatly distinguished himself, especially by his speech on the judiciary question." The position taken by Henderson, as exponent of the Federalist view, possesses exceptional interest in view of the extraordinary fact that down to the present time, no judicial review of the repealing act has even been had; and indeed, the constitutionality of the act has been challenged by so eminent an authority as Justice Story.*

The situation, as viewed by the Republicans, was most effectively stated by Jefferson himself: "They (the Federalists) have retired into the judiciary as a stronghold. There the remains of federalism are to be preserved and fed from the Treasury; and from that battery all the works of republicanism are to be beaten down and destroyed." Actuated by such a belief, the Republicans passed the repeal bill by a majority of one in the Senate and by a vote of fifty-nine to thirty-two in the House. The dejection of the Federalists is expressed in the letter of James A. Bayard, the Federalist leader, to Andrew Bayard, January 21, 1802: "This decision (repeal of the judiciary law) I consider as an event which cannot be too much lamented. It establishes a principle fraught with the worst consequences under such governments as exist in the United States. The independence of the judiciary power is prostrated. A judge instead of holding his office for life will hold it during the good pleasure of the dominant Party. The Judges will of course become Partizans, and the shadow of Justice alone will remain in our Courts."† Archibald Henderson was profoundly shocked by this "work of destruction," as he termed it. He found a congressional career little congenial to his tastes; and, also influenced by the fact that his wife preferred Salisbury to Washington as a place of residence, he followed his original intention expressed at the expiration of his first term, and declined to stand for Congress again as the representative of the Salisbury district at the next election. His feelings at this time, voiced in the effusive language of the period, are betrayed in a letter to Samuel Johnston of April 27, 1802: "I hope their sitting (Congress) will long be remembered by the American People. The work of Virtue, the toil of Wisdom—the American Government—has fallen into ruin. The fatal blow is struck. I fear it is now impossible to arrest the arm of power. It is probable that I view the acts of the Majority with a prejudicial eye; perhaps the conflict of party and irritation of debate may have disqualified me from taking a calm survey of their measures. But my impressions are that nothing but ruin and misery await the deluded people of this once happy Country."

Another important issue arose during the period of Henderson's service in Congress, in connection with the continuing in force of the Sedition Act. Ever since 1798, when the Alien and Sedition Acts were passed, the Republicans led by Jefferson had vehemently protested against them as instrumentalities designed by the Federalists to centralize the government, if not to establish a monarchy. Protests came from many parts of the country, notably from the Middle States and the South, in behalf of "freedom of speech" and "liberty of the press." On February 21, 1801, in anticipation of the expiration of the Sedition Act on March 3, an attempt was made to renew and continue the most effective portion of the act. Men of the stamp of Henderson and his boyhood schoolmate in Granville, Robert Goodloe Harper, regarded the Act as "the one barrier that stood between Democratic fury and public liberty."* In an "Address to his Constituents" of February 28, 1801, which is a model in political exposition and forthright candor, Henderson lucidly sets forth his views concerning the subject:

"A bill to continue in force that part of the act commonly called the Sedition Law, which declares, 'that if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written,

*"I wish," said Harper, on January 21, 1801, in one of his last speeches in Congress, "to interpose this law between the freedom of discussion and the overbearing sway of that tyrannical spirit by which a certain political party in this country is actuated, which arrogates to itself to speak in the name of the people, knows neither moderation, mercy, nor justice, regards neither feeling, principle, nor right, and sweeps down with relentless fury all that dares detect its follies, oppose its progress or resist its domination." The party referred to is, of course, the Republican party. Compare C. W. Summerville: Robert Goodloe Harper.

printed, uttered or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering or publishing, any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either house of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said government, or either house of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them or either of them into contempt or disrepute, shall be liable to punishment,' has been rejected by the House of Representatives. As I am one of those who voted for a continuance of this law, I shall take the liberty of offering my reasons for this conduct. The law punishes only those who write or print malicious falsehoods against the government, or its officers. It is said that this law is a violation of that part of the constitution which says, 'That Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.' Gentlemen opposed to the law contend, that any restraint upon the press is an abridgement of its freedom. The words freedom of the press mean, in their true technical import, an exemption from any controul previous to its publication; or in other words, that every person may be at liberty to publish anything he pleases, without consulting the will of any person. In this manner the phrase has been understood for ages; its meaning is as well ascertained as that of any word in our language; but it was never contended until lately, that the person who was thus at liberty to write and publish, was not answerable for the abuse of this liberty. As well might a man complain that the LIBERTY of speech was abridged, because he could not be at LIBERTY to tell scandalous and malicious falsehoods of his neighbor; or that the freedom of action was restrained, because he could not be permitted to beat, wound, and abuse every man he meets on the highway. No man can be punished under this law who does not publish a wicked, malicious and scandalous falsehood, with intent to bring the government of the United States into disrepute, and knowing it to be false at the time of its publication. Is there an honest man in the nation who wishes for this privilege?

"I am sensible there is not.

"It is then said, by gentlemen inimical to the law, that though it may be true that Congress have the power of passing such an act, it is inexpedient and improper to exercise this power; that the government cannot be injured if its acts are just and proper, by any misrepresentations or falsehoods. This doctrine would be true were all the people placed in a situation to judge correctly for themselves. But you know Sir, this is impossible; the people must be informed through the medium of the public prints, and if those prints teem with falsehoods and malicious abuse, they will be deceived; and instead of forming just opinions they will be constantly led astray. Will it be said that they can tell what is false and what is not?

How, I beseech you, are they to distinguish; facts are stated in the papers as true, and we are gravely told, that citizens five hundred miles distant from the seat of government are able to know that they are false. I am convinced that no government can exist for any length of time if it is continually abused by malicious slanderers, without having the power of punishing them. I believe it is as essential to its existence to have this power, as it is to have the power of suppressing insurrection or repelling invasion; under this impression, I voted for making the law perpetual. You, sir, and my constituents will judge of the propriety of this vote."*

XII.

The author of "The Defence of North Carolina," in the introduction to that work, vigorously maintains that Thomas Jefferson ruthlessly smothered the highest public spirit in North Carolina. "Mark the history of his influence among us. In 1801, the period of his boasted victory, what was the condition of our State? Who were her great men?—who her political leaders? Governor Johnston, General Davie, James Iredell, Alfred Moore, Archibald Henderson, were among the signs of our political zodiac, whose lustre was obscured by the ascent of this most 'malign influence.' The virtue and ability of the State, which had opposed the elevation of Mr. Jefferson, were overlooked and thrust aside, to make way, let history say for whom." Somewhat more than a modicum of truth lurks in the exaggerated statement of Jo. Seawell Jones. The movement set on foot by General Davie, in correspondence with General John Steele, in 1801, was designed to establish a firm basis for Federalism in North Carolina. As

*In this connection should be read a similar "Letter to his Constituents" of February 26, 1801, written by Henderson's childhood friend and schoolmate, Robert Goodloe Harper, in which he says: "I voted for this continuation (of the Sedition Act) and supported it with all my might; because I considered the law as highly proper and beneficial, in respect both to the government and the people; for while, on the one hand, it provides for the punishment of those who publish false, scandalous and malicious libels against the government, on the other, it enables persons who are indicted for libels, to give the truth of the matter in evidence for their justification, which the common law forbids, and limits the fine and imprisonment, which by the common law is wholly in the discretion of the court." For the full text of this and many similar letters by Harper, compare Annual Report American Historical Association, 1913, II.

the result of Federalist activities, the Raleigh Minerva became the party organ in 1802; and a fund was to be raised for its maintenance through the efforts of such Federalist leaders and supporters as Archibald Henderson, Duncan Cameron, William R. Davie, William Barry Grove, John Moore, and others. This plan, as stated by Cameron, had "for its end the noble objects of suppressing falsehood and disseminating truth, of subverting the wild and visionary projects and opinions of Democracy and advocating in their place sound, substantial, practical principles of Federalism."* The four Federalists in Congress, Archibald Henderson, William Barry Grove, John Stanly, and William H. Hill, in accordance with a position which had been that of the North Carolina Federalists since the adoption of the Constitution, refused to be instructed by the Republican legislature to support the plan for the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801; and this refusal was voiced in Congress by Henderson.† General John Steele, North Carolina's leading Federalist at Washington not in Congress, who had held the position of Comptroller General of the United States Treasury under Washington and Adams, and was retained in office by Jefferson, withdrew from his post late in the autumn of 1802, against the protests of both Jefferson and Nathaniel Macon. In the summer of 1803, General Davie "stood for Congress" against Willis Alston, a pronounced Democrat; and a vigorous contest ensued. And yet, as Professor Dodd observes, "the newspaper plans of Duncan Cameron and others, the 'hue and cry,' as Macon says, raised in defense of the Constitution, which was so endangered; the retirement from tacit support of Jefferson of Gen. John Steele, and the violent campaign in favor of so prominent a man as General Davie, all came to nought in 1803."‡ Davie was defeated and retired from politics; while Grove, Stanly and Hill, who had voted against the repeal of the Judiciary Act in 1802, were all defeated, each being superseded by a Republican. This overwhelming defeat dealt Federalism in North Carolina a blow from which it never recovered.*

"During his two terms in Congress," says Judge W. H. Battle in speaking of Archibald Henderson, "he attained a distinction scarcely inferior to that which he had at the bar." Firmly grounded in the principles of Federalism, he remained in the faith to the day of his death. After his service in Congress, where he was succeeded in 1803 by his brother-in-law, Nathaniel Alexander, of Mecklenburg, he never again held high public office, State or national, although his name was put forward on more than one occasion. Being of the "prescribed sect of Federalists," to employ William Gaston's apt phrase, he could not aspire, with any expectation of success, even had he been animated by political ambition, to the office of Governor or United States Senator, no matter how conspicuous or eminent his talents and merits might be. "In 1814," for example, as pointed out by Mr. William Henry Hoyt, "probably no Republican in the State except Macon was so well fitted for public office as Henderson, Grove, Stanly, Steele, Pearson, and Gaston, yet none of these men could hope" for high political preferment—"except Gaston, who had recently gone to Congress from a Federalist stronghold after meeting defeat in the elections of 1810."†

In truth, Archibald Henderson cared little for public office, a fact well known to his friends and contemporaries. The legal profession, that severe and exacting mistress, received the full measure of his devotion; and the best years of his life were zealously dedicated to the service of the law. In spite of his indifference to public position, he was again and again called upon to represent the town of Salisbury and the county of Rowan in the General Assembly of North Carolina. With conscientious fidelity, he served in the legislatures of 1807, 1808, 1809, 1814, 1819, and 1820. No record of that service need be set forth here. Suffice it to say that, during his various terms in the legislature, questions relating to the reform of the judiciary were constantly referred to him as an established authority.

Memorable among the intimacies between public men in North Carolina during the early years of the last century was the friendship which existed between Archibald Henderson and William Gaston. The principles of Federalism, in which both were firmly grounded, was a close bond of intellectual sympathy. Each cherished an unbounded admiration for Washington as the ideal statesman, and an ineradicable distrust of Jefferson as a philosophic dilettante in politics who was subservient to French influence. Acting with him in the Legislature and in important suits before the Supreme Court, Henderson came to recognize in Gaston qualities which he revered—transparent purity of purpose, nobility of spirit, profound legal learning, and a mastery in eloquent exposition. In his turn, Gaston found in his friend attributes which he equally revered—innate modesty of disposition, a lofty conception of his duty as a citizen, habitual deference to the law and its votaries, and genius in the art of advocacy.

The personal and political association of these two commanding figures, warm friends and leading Federalists, finds striking exemplification in the memorable speeches which they delivered in the North Carolina General Assembly, on December 11, 1807. These speeches, which are memorable as discussions of the principle of States' Rights and criticisms of Jefferson's administrations, were made in opposition to the Address to the President of the United States, proposed by John Hamilton, of Pasquotank County. The Address, crassly partisan in its politics, expressed extravagant approbation of Jefferson's administration, in particular with reference to the stand he had taken in the impressment controversy with Great Britain; and, in an almost servile manner, requested Jefferson to be a candidate for re-election. The original resolution, which had been introduced three weeks earlier, contained the sentence: "The General Assembly beg leave to solicit you to permit your name to be held up as a candidate at the next presidential election"; and the bitter animus against the Federalists was expressed in an amendment, in which it was declared "that the safety of the nation was endangered by the machinations of a party who seek to subvert because they cannot direct the government."

In his speech Gaston, who did not flinch from arousing the clamors of some, described himself as belonging to "the proscribed sect of Federalists." In the course of a spirited debate, he vehemently opposed the address on the ground that the legislature of North Carolina was "not authorized to sit in judgment on the conduct of the national executive"; and he further maintained that, even were it authorized to do so, the right should be exercised only in cases of great emergency. The speech delivered by Henderson traverses the position of the Federalists and embodies searching criticism of Jefferson and his administration. As the result of the speeches of Gaston and Henderson, the Address to the President of the United States, after being considerably improved by the omission of offensive political allusions and the abandonment of its servile tone, was finally passed by a vote of eighty-three to thirty-five, both Gaston and Henderson voting in the negative.

The speech delivered by Henderson on this occasion is reproduced in part below:

"I regret extremely that the resolution which is the subject of debate, was introduced to the consideration of this House. . . . It speaks a language which in my conscience I cannot approve, because I believe it is not true. It in the most unqualified manner approbates the whole of Mr. Jefferson's administration; and every man in this House who votes for its adoption, declares to his constituents and the world, that no single act of the President meets his disapprobation.

"I do not feel disposed thus far. I do not believe that his conduct merits this unbounded applause. Those gentlemen who really believe that the whole of the President's administration has been founded in the most enlightened policy, and has guarded the honor and promoted the interest of the nation, will vote for the adoption of the resolution; those gentlemen, on the contrary, who think that there are objections to some part of his conduct, and though they may approve of other parts, will, I apprehend, be compelled to give their negative to the measure proposed. We are therefore forced, Mr. Speaker, by the very nature of the question, to examine the general features of Mr. Jefferson's administration. It will be recollected that this necessity has been imposed upon us much against our wishes: every mode in our power has been attempted to avoid this unpleasant discussion. If the motion of my friend from Newbern (Mr. Gaston) to postpone the further consideration of the whole of the resolutions had have prevailed, the House would have been relieved from much trouble, and the debate we are now engaged in, avoided. . . . I know, full well I know, that what I am about to observe, will not be pleasing to a number of gentlemen on this floor. But when imperious duty points the way which I should tread, and timid policy directs another, I hope I shall always have firmness enough not to hesitate for a moment what course to pursue; regardless of the frowns of the majority here, or the tumultuous cries of a deluded populace out of doors.

"One of the greatest blessings which a nation can enjoy is an able, upright and independent judiciary. This judiciary, Sir, we had in its utmost purity when Mr. Jefferson was called on by the voice of his country to fill the presidential chair. Scarcely had he taken the reins of government into his hands; scarcely had the members of Congress taken their seats at their first session after his election, when the chief magistrate of the nation, in terms too unequivocal to be mistaken, recommends a repeal of a law under which judges had been appointed, and had actually performed judicial duties. The doctrine was new in America. Before this period it was believed that a judge, once appointed, was secure in his office as long as he behaved well, and that no power on earth could deprive him of it. I will not now enter into an argument to show the gross absurdity of construing the words during good behaviour to mean at the will of the legislature. Enough on this subject has already been said; and to that understanding which can yield assent to the miserable arguments which have been used to prove the power of Congress to displace their judges by the repeal of a law I am sure it is useless at this day to say a single word. But I must be permitted to say, that the time will come, of necessity, it must come, when the bitter effects of this passionate act of the President and of Congress, will be severely felt and deeply lamented by the American people. Their judiciary is now prostrated at the feet of the legislature: The independence of their judges is gone I fear forever: A great department of government is destroyed; a department which engaged the anxious attention of the convention which framed our constitution, and which ought to be more dear to the people than any other; because in times of faction and tumult, it is the only one on which they can rely with confidence and safety. I think it unnecessary to press this subject farther on the House, for I conscientiously believe this legislature could not be induced by any consideration, to pass a law which should deprive their judges of their offices. . . . So deeply rooted is the opinion that our judges are independent of the legislature so long as they behave well. I ask gentlemen if they approve of this act of the chief magistrate? I implore them calmly and dispassionately to give their opinion. Is it their wish that their rights should be tried by men perfectly free from bias? Can that man be supposed to be free from bias who holds his seat at the will of another? We know it is natural for man to be indisposed to thwart the views of those on whom he is dependent. Whatever may be the conduct of others, I for one will never give my confidence or express my attachment to a man who has been the great cause of producing an evil more extensively mischievous to the American people, and which is to entail upon them more lasting misery than any act of the bitterest enemy of this nation.

"When Mr. Jefferson came into power, we had a flourishing navy, and the means were provided for making it respectable. What has become of our vessels? Either sold for a sum far less than they cost, or suffered to rot in their harbors. It is confidently believed at this day, few men can be found, possessing the smallest share of political information, and not blinded by party spirit, who do not see the necessity of keeping up a navy, sufficient at least to protect our coast. It is childish to suppose that our rights will be respected by foreign nations, unless we are prepared to protect them by other means than proclamations.* Is it believed that we should be insulted in our ports and harbors by almost every nation with whom we have connections, if we were prepared to repel force by force? Let every candid man in this House answer the question, and if he will suffer his understanding, unclouded by passion or prejudice, to make the answer, I do not fear the result.

"Mr. Speaker, I have other objections to Mr. Jefferson's administration, which it is difficult to delineate, because they do not arise from any particular act of his, but from the general cast and complexion of his whole conduct. I have ever held it to be the first duty of a great magistrate, to instil into the people a pride of character, a dignity of sentiment, an inviolable attachment to the honor as well as the interest of the nation. It ought to be impressed on them that a wholesome, energetic government is the greatest blessing which Providence in his mercy has given to man; but that it ought to command their reverence and excite their attachment. They ought to be told in a bold, manly and open language, that taxes are indispensably necessary to support their government and to secure them the inestimable blessings flowing from order and legitimate power. I appeal to the wise and dispassionate of this House, and ask them if the general character of the President's administration has not been to corrupt and demoralize the public mind. By corruption I do not mean that he has made them thieves or robbers; I mean to say that he has suffered to evaporate that manly pride and spirit of independence which conducted us through the revolutionary war, and at last gave us rank among the nations of the earth. The people have become impatient of governmental restraint, and have lost all reverence for established usages and the settled order of things. Honor, virtue and talents give no claim to public confidence. Few men can get into power who do not devote themselves to the caprice of the people: and, Mr. Speaker, there is a laxity in government which is truly alarming, and threatens, if not corrected, to destroy the political fabrick. There is also a wretched thirst for gain, which has absorbed every other passion, and bids fair to make us what foreigners have said we are—*a nation of shopkeepers. Go into any company, the enquiry is not, Has our honor and character been protected? Has reparation been made for insult and injury? Are our ports and harbors protected? But the question is, Has our national debt been diminished? These symptoms, Sir, are the sure presages of impending ruin: they evidence a general debility, which if not soon corrected, must end in a premature death. I am not disposed to assert that all these have been produced by Mr. Jefferson, but I do say his general conduct has had a tendency to produce them.

"I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the President has been highly blameable in not endeavoring to discover the true interest of the country, and pursuing that with inflexible perseverance. But we know he has almost invariably waited to discover the temper and disposition of the people, and then shape his measures according to their wishes. So that instead of being guided by wisdom and enlightened policy, he has been governed by town meetings and popular assemblies.†

"It has been said by a gentleman whom I do not see in his seat, (Mr. Hamilton) that the President has purchased Louisiana, to obtain which the Federalists were anxious to go to war. Permit me, Sir, to correct that gentleman. When the king of Spain withheld the right of deposit at New Orleans, which had been solemnly granted to us by treaty, the Federalists were willing to seize by force that island and compel a performance of that stipulation which had been guaranteed by contract: they saw in the conduct of the Spanish Court, a determined hostility to this country; and if justice could not be obtained by friendly means, they thought the character and interest of the nation so deeply concerned that they were anxious to enforce it by an appeal to arms. But, Sir, it was the right of deposit alone that they claimed. We then had no right to Louisiana, nor do I believe it was their wish to obtain it on any terms. I have ever viewed the purchase of that immense territory highly pernicious to this country, and a damning evidence of the disposition of Mr. Jefferson to please the multitude, though he should sacrifice the permanent interest of the nation. . . . When this territory shall be added, disunion must be the consequence. . . . The consequence of a separation of these United States is big with calamities, easily foreseen, but difficult and perhaps improper to describe.

"It will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that Aaron Burr has recently been tried in the Circuit Court of the District of Virginia, for high treason, and after the most able and patient investigation, which was ever made in this, or perhaps any other country, acquitted under the direction of the Chief Justice. . . . What, Sir, has been the conduct of the Chief Magistrate? Congress has been called on to review this decision, and to ascertain whether there is a defect in the evidence, in the law, or the administration of the law. Is it possible to suppose that Mr. Jefferson really believed that Congress has a power to correct the decisions of the courts of the United States? No sir, he knows they have no such power, and that they cannot interfere except there is ground to impeach the judge. The papers which he has laid before Congress, cannot furnish matter even to institute an inquiry. I have understood that these papers contain nothing more than the documents and evidence which were offered to the court and jury on the trial of Burr. It is impossible to collect from them anything which might justify a criminal prosecution; at most they could only prove that the Chief Justice had mistaken the force of the evidence, or had drawn from it incorrect legal deductions; and we all know that this furnishes no just cause of impeachment. Then I ask, What was the object in making this communication? Was it to impair the confidence which the nation had in the integrity of this distinguished man? . . . Whatever was the object, I will venture to say it strikes a deadly blow at the independence of your courts. If every judicial opinion which is not pleasing to the President, is to be brought under the revision of Congress, and the judge in effect denounced who gives this opinion, we may bid a long farewell to an independent judiciary."*

The Minerva*, Raleigh, N. C. No. 612. Dec. 24, 1807.

As a brief memento of the friendship between Gaston and Henderson, the following extract, affording an interesting sidelight on the feelings of the hour, is quoted from a letter of Henderson to Gaston, March 7, 1810:

My dear Gaston:—

. . . I am tired, seriously tired, of attending these County Superior Courts. Nothing but noise, confusion and ignorance. The profit is nothing, the honor nothing. I find I am in a fair way to get rid of what legal learning I possessed and in a few years expect to be as well qualified for a Judge as any Democrat in the State. . . . What can I say on the head of Politicks—will not the doings of this Congress be remembered, long remembered, with horror and astonishment. The dismissal of Jackson will and must lead to war. . . . Is it not strange, passing strange, that the administration should for a moment have believed that the wise of the nation could be imposed on by the miserable tale of British insult. I boldly say there was no insult offered by Jackson, at least the documents published do not show it.

. . . I am gloomy—pray write to me and tell something that will rouse my spirits. If you can tell me nothing new let me know that you are well and expect better times.

God bless you, my dear Gaston, and be assured that I am yours, etc.

Sincere regards, A. Henderson.*

One incident, bearing upon Henderson's life as a public character, is deserving of mention, as an illustration of his self-effacing modesty. In 1818, the Supreme Court Bill became a law; and on December 9, when the nominations for judges were made, the names of both Archibald Henderson and Leonard Henderson, his brother, were presented, along with the names of Judges Taylor, Hall, and Seawell, and Messrs. Bartlett Yancey and Archibald D. Murphey. Although assured of election, Archibald Henderson withdrew his name in favor of his brother. He is quoted by the Hon. Hugh Waddell as saying that "one of the family on the Supreme Bench was quite enough."† An interesting and

*For a copy of this letter I am indebted to Judge H. G. Connor.

†In a letter from Raleigh, Dec. 9, to Judge Thomas Ruffin, describing the details of the contest, Archibald D. Murphey says: "One of the Hendersons (it is not settled which) is to be withdrawn. The other will be elected . . ." W. H. Hoyt: The Papers of Archibald D. Murphey, I, 122.

authentic anecdote is told of Archibald Henderson in this connection. With all his great powers of reflection, Leonard Henderson was not very practical in matters of business, and made no especial financial success out of the rough hurly-burly of law practice. His brother, Archibald, on the other hand, was conspicuous for practical wisdom and business sagacity. Furthermore he enjoyed a very lucrative practice as a lawyer. When the two brothers were nominated for the Supreme Court Bench, Archibald laughingly remarked: "I am going to withdraw in Leonard's favor—because I can make a living at the law, and Leonard can't."

Our North Carolina Indians

By Colonel Fred A. Olds.

Few subjects are more fascinating than the Indians of North Carolina, yet it has required three hundred years and more of study by noted experts to develop their true story, so that one does not have to depend upon tradition, which is all too often mere misinformation.

There were many tribes of Indians in North Carolina, but only two large ones, the Cherokee (really Tsalagi, or Cave-people), and the Tuscarora (really Skaruren, or Hemp-gatherers, because they gathered the Cannabis Indica, or wild hemp, for various uses); the Cherokee taking their name from the caves in their high mountain country. Both of these have a written language and considerable literature, books, newspapers, etc.

There have been strong arguments by certain persons to the effect that the Indians of America are the descendants of the "Ten Lost Tribes" of Israel. The Indians were called by the Spaniards Indios, because they thought this country was part of India. The Indians had no term or name for all of their people. Their names for individuals, for tribes and for towns, for streams and other things, were all taken from something they observed or which affected the person or locality. Take the word "hominy," for example: it comes from two Indian words, aham (he beats), and min (grain). The coast Indians in 1586 called those in the interior of North Carolina Renapoak, meaning "true men."

It has been proposed by some scientists to call the Indians of this country "Amerind," a contraction of "American Indian," but this is not yet agreed on.

There were more than a score of Indian tribes worth mentioning in North Carolina, the greatest being the Cherokee and the Tuscarora, already referred to, and perhaps the first tribe to be mentioned in history has a curious record. This was the Roanok, which means, "Northern people," who were found on the island of Wococan (which means curved or bent) by Amadas and Barlowe in 1584. These explorers thought Roanok was the name of the island and Wingandacoa that of the country, but their mistake is now known. The meaning of Roanok, which by custom of speech has become Roanoke, is wampum, peak, or money, made of bored shells strung on strings. The village of Roanok, or Roanoke, was one of those of the Secotan tribe, which in 1584 was found in the peninsula between Albemarle Sound and the lower Pamlico River and its adjacent islands. The word Secotan means "burned place." Later this territory was occupied by the Machapunga, Pamlico and Hatteras tribes, possibly descendants of the Secotans. It is interesting to know that the Secotans had complete belief in the immortality of the soul.

The Tuscarora lived on the Roanoke, Taw (or Torhunta, or Narhontes); and Pamlico rivers. They were much set upon by the whites, and under their chief, Hencock, joined forces with the Coree, Pamlico and others, and tried in 1711, in two wars, to destroy the whites, but were overcome. They went back north, whence they had come, and were adopted politically by the great tribes in northern New York, known as the Five Nations. They were thus given asylum on motion of the Oneida tribe, in the federal council, and it is strange how this was done. First, the Tuscarora were made a baby, next a young man, then a man, then an assistant to the official woman-cooks, then a warrior, and last a peer or chief in the great council, all of these successive stages being passed, each with impressive ceremonies.

And this brings up the point that it was the woman who was, and is in most tribes today, the head of the household and the real head of affairs generally. To her the children belong, and not to the father, and she has all the rights in most tribes that the women of the United States are striving for—in some tribes even more.

The first story told about the Indians in North Carolina was of course, by Amadas and Barlowe, and from that time until a very recent period there has been no end of misinformation in many ways. The writer will undertake to call the roll of the tribes, and give a word about each:

Moratoc; lived near the Virginia line, about 160 miles from the mouth of the Moratoc or Roanoke River; an important tribe in 1586, but would hold no communication of any sort with the Englishmen.

Cape Fear; lived up that stream, near its mouth, in Brunswick County, of it very little being known except the location.

Choanoc (They of the South, the Southerners); a small tribe in Chowan County, which took its name from them.

Machapunga (bad dust); an affiliated tribe of the Algonquian family, which lived in Hyde County, and which in 1701 had thirty warriors, it and the Coree living together at one village, named Mattamuskeet, lying on the north shore of the lake of that name.

Pamlico; a small tribe, of the Algonquian family, living on the sounds.

Bear River; a tribe which in 1701 had fifty warriors and only one village, Raudauquaquank, this being in Craven County, on the bank of the Neuse River.

Coree; possibly Algonquian, living on the peninsula of the Neuse River in Carteret and Craven counties. In 1686 this tribe had been reduced greatly by bloody wars, its barbarity being noted among the other Indians. The Coree were also called Coranine and Connemoc, and they had one town in 1701, Raruta, with a population of 125. They went into the war of 1711 with the Tuscarora, and in 1715 they and the Machapunga were given a tract of land on Lake Mattamuskeet in Hyde County, where they lived until they became extinct.

Catawba; these were South Carolina Indians, but in 1841 many of them removed to the country of the Cherokee in western North Carolina, but all except two became dissatisfied and returned.

Neuse; lived where New Bern now is, their town being named Chattooka, and removed, after Baron DeGraffenreid burned it, to the Tuscarora, with whom they were specially intimate.

Hatteras; an Algonquian tribe, living on the sand banks about Cape Hatteras in 1701, and frequenting Roanoke Island, their only town being known as Sand Banks, and having 80 inhabitants. These Indians were mixed white and Indian, and claimed that some of their ancestors were white.

Secotan; an Algonquian tribe in 1584, on the peninsula between Albemarle Sound and the lower Pamlico River.

Cape Fear; a little tribe, possibly Siouan, near the mouth of the Cape Fear River in 1661. A New England colony settled there and sent away a number of the Indian children, claiming these were to be educated. The Indians drove off the colonists, but others came and bought lands of the Indian chief, Watcoosa. There were several villages, Necoes being the principal one. In 1665 a second colony of whites settled at Oldtown, in Brunswick County. In 1715 the Cape Fear had 206 people, living in five villages, and that year they took part in the war with the Yamasi Indians, from south of Charleston, and suffered terribly. In 1751 South Carolina asked the Iroquois Indians to be at peace with the Cape Fear, which were then spoken of as a "small friendly tribe."

Keyauwee; a small tribe, near the center of North Carolina, affiliated with the Saponi, Tutelo and one or two others, and found in 1701 near where High Point now is. These Indians had a very strange habit of wearing whiskers and mustaches, and their chief was Keyauwee Jack. This tribe and their affiliates, seven tribes in all, mustering 750 souls, went just over the line into South Carolina and settled on the Pee Dee River.

Neusioc; unclassified tribe, perhaps of Iroquoian stock, found in 1584 in Craven and Carteret counties, which in 1701 had only 15 warriors and two villages, Chattooka and Rouconk.

Eno; a tribe different in physique from their neighbors, all their alliances being with Siouan tribes. They had well-built houses and barns, in which they stored grain and other supplies, and they were quite thrifty. They became incorporated with the Shakori, these two tribes being confederated in 1701. Their chief town was Adshusheer. They also became incorporated with the Saponi and their confederates to the northward, disappearing as a tribe in 1720, but in 1743 still retained the Eno dialect. They lived about the headwaters of the Tar and the Neuse rivers. The names Eno and Shocco, now remaining, tell the story of these Indians, who traded much with the Tuscarora. In 1714 the Eno, Tutelo, Saponi, Occaneechi and Keyauwee, numbering about 750 in all, moved toward the English settlements in the eastern section of North Carolina. Finally most of the Eno went to South Carolina, a few going with the Sapelo to Virginia.

Occaneechi; a rather small tribe found on islands on Roanoke River and later on the Eno River, and who were joined by the Saponi and Tutelo and by the Conestoga, the latter having come from Pennsylvania and taken shelter in North Carolina from the Iroquois. The Occaneechi had two chiefs, one in charge of war and the other of hunting and agriculture.

Cotechney; a small tribe, which has already been described in connection with the extreme eastern Indian septs.

Adshusheer; a tribe associated with the Eno and Shakori in 1711, with its chief town near where Durham now is, its ruler claiming territory and authority as far as the Haw and Reatkin (now called the Yadkin) rivers. It is doubtful that they were of Siouan stock. There is only one mention of them in history; this by John Lawson in 1701. Shakori, or Shocorri, their principal village, was near Hillsboro, its chief being Eno Will, who was a guide for John Lawson, the surveyor-general for the Lords Proprietors.

Saponi; one of the eastern Siouan tribes, now entirely extinct; its language being the same as that of the Tutelo, and the words Siouan. The Saponi moved eastward, toward the coast country, to get away from Indian raids, and their town in this new location was near where Windsor, Bertie County, now is. In 1715 Governor Spottswood, of Virginia, took them, and other little tribes who had joined with them, to that colony, and from it in 1753 they went to New York and joined the Six Nations, but in 1779 fled to Canada, and so pass out from all knowledge.

Tutelo; almost the same as the Saponi in characteristics. The Iroquois called all the Indians in central North Carolina Tutels.

Cherokee; the best known of all the tribes, and the only one now remaining in the State; a powerful detached tribe of the Iroquoian family, which occupied the whole mountain region in the southern Alleghanies in southwest Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama, and claimed the territory all the way to the Ohio River. The Cherokee had three dialects—the upper, middle and lower. They originally came to this part of the country from the north, and their language is undeniably Iroquoian. They were first met by DeSoto in 1540. They came here to escape attacks from the Iroquois and Delaware. They held their mountains against all comers. In 1838 the greater part of them were removed to the Indian Nation, but 2,000 remained, and the Eastern Band, as it is officially known, of the Cherokee Nation occupies 60,000 acres of land, held in common, in Swain and Jackson counties, numbering there 2,285, about 300 more being in Graham County. The Cherokee in North Carolina are given education by the United States in a most thorough manner, from primary school to college. They have served in nearly all of the wars on the side of the whites, having several hundred men in the North Carolina Confederate troops, their chief having been the colonel of the 69th North Carolina Regiment. They have men now in the 1st Regiment of the North Carolina National Guard. Their chief town is Yellow Hill, lying on the Oconalufty (Agwanulta, properly meaning "by the river"), and here their fine school is located, which will in a few years be turned over to North Carolina. The Cherokee are the most widely distributed throughout the United States, the best educated and the most influential of all Indians. There are seven "clans"; wolf, deer, hawk, owl, and three not translatable. The Cherokee in the United States are now probably as numerous as at any time in their history.

Weapomeioc; a small tribe, found by Governor John White in 1586, its village being Chapanoc, on Albemarle Sound; this and the other little tribes referred to in those earliest days having later become known by other names and so passed out of existence.

Croatan; a so-called group of Indians, living mainly in Robeson County. James Mooney, the noted expert, who is regarded as the finest authority on Indian history, says the theory that the Croatan are descended from the "Lost Colony" of Roanoke Island is baseless. Mr. Mooney has spent much of his life in North Carolina, studying these matters, and was here in 1916. He says the Croatan "embrace the blood of the wasted native tribes, the early colonists or forest rovers, runaway slaves and other negroes, and that of a steady stream of the Latin races from coasting vessels in the West India and Brazilian trade." The Croatan applied for recognition by the United States as Cherokee, but it was denied and the Cherokee acknowledge no relationship, having visited the Croatan country on a tour of inspection. There is a queer offshoot of the Croatan known as "Malungeons," in South Carolina, who went there from this state; another the "Redbones," of Tennessee. Mr. Mooney has made a careful study of both of these branches also.

One thing should be remembered in regard to the Indians of North Carolina, always excepting the Cherokee: In all the South, up to the time of the Revolution, Indian slaves were bought and sold and worked in the fields with the negroes, and thus amalgamation to a greater or less degree was brought about, the negroes gaining more from the Indians than the latter did from the negroes.

So complete has been the annihilation or absorption of the Indians along the eastern coast that the assertion is made officially that there is now not a native full-blood all the way anywhere between Delaware and Pamlico Sound.

The Indians usually lived in houses made of mat or bark, and within the past seventy-five years the Cherokee had bark houses in their mountain territory. The chiefs of the various tribes had varying authority, and some of them used a baton as the emblem of it; such a baton, of hardwood, beautifully carved, being now in the North Carolina Hall of History.

It should be borne in mind that the Indians were not nomads, for each tribe claimed and lived in a certain tract or region, with well understood boundaries, handed down by tradition and not ordinarily relinquished save to superior force. The land was always held in common, never individually or by family. The fact that the early white settlers did not understand this fact caused trouble and bloodshed and war, again and again.

Many people have an idea that what we call corn, Indian corn or maize, was native here in North Carolina, while in fact it was brought here from Mexico, and its name came from the Arawak word "marish." The North Carolina Indians planted its grains four to the hill, it being thought bad luck for them to touch each other.

There are two other queer beliefs besides those about our Indians, and in conclusion one may be exposed which has prevailed a long, long time, this being that the scuppernong grape was first found on Roanoke Island by Amadas and Barlowe, and that the Indians there esteemed it greatly. As a matter of fact, this grape originated on what is now called the Scuppernong River, the Indian name of which was Askupo-nong, which means "at the place of the bay tree," this tree, the North Carolina magnolia, being very abundant there. So on that river, near Columbia, Tyrrell County, this white variety of the dark muscadine or bullace grape, was found about 150 years ago by two men named Alexander, and the river gave the name. It was taken to Roanoke Island and everywhere else where this splendid grape will flourish.

The State Navy of North Carolina in the War of the Revolution

An Address delivered before the Summer School of the State College, at West Raleigh, N. C., July 2, 1917

By Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In all the range of North Carolina history I doubt whether a single topic can be found about which so little is known, even by close students of our State's past, as the part borne by her sailors in furthering the cause of American Independence, and so I have decided to speak for a short while this evening on The State Navy of North Carolina in the War of the Revolution.

At a meeting of the Provincial Council of North Carolina, held in the court-house of Johnston County during the month of December, 1775, it was resolved (on the 21st of that month) that a necessity existed for the fitting out of armed vessels for the protection of the trade of the province. The number of ships first provided for was three, and commissioners were appointed to carry into effect this resolution. One at Cape Fear (the ports of Wilmington and Brunswick), one at New Bern, and one at Edenton, were ordered to be "fitted out with all dispatch." Provision was also made for chartering other vessels at New Bern, Wilmington, and Edenton—and so the Navy of North Carolina had its beginning some months before the Thirteen American Colonies had declared themselves free and independent States. The aforementioned orders of the Provincial Council were promptly carried out, and it may be added that the local Committees of Safety, in the various sea-coast counties, sometimes had a more economical mode of acquiring ships than by purchase; for, when the Defiance, under the command of Captain John Cooper, and the Belville, under the command of Captain Vance, violated the maritime regulations of North Carolina, while anchored at New Bern, the vessels were promptly seized. A similar fate was narrowly escaped by the sloop King Fisher, of which John Strange was owner and Lott Strange master. Another instance, somewhat similar, arose when it was made to appear to the Provincial Congress at Halifax that the brigantine William, then anchored in Beaufort Harbor, and of which Philip Westcott was master, was British property, for a resolution was passed by that body on April 10, 1776, directing her seizure and detention till further orders.

On May 9, 1776, the North Carolina Provincial Congress at Halifax opened up negotiations with Virginia for the purpose of securing the construction of two armed ships by that province to co-operate with the North Carolina vessels already on duty guarding Ocracoke Inlet, which could be used as a gateway by British ships in attacking either colony. The same State Congress at Halifax authorized the North Carolina Council of Safety to establish Courts of Admiralty at the ports of Edenton, Bath, New Bern, and Wilmington, and this was accordingly done on June 22, 1776. Admiralty Judges were duly appointed by the same authority and vested with power to commission marshals, registrars, and such other officers as might be necessary for the enforcement of the maritime laws of the province.

In the Summer and Fall of the year 1776 there were marked activities in North Carolina in constructing vessels of a variety of types—some being well-armed ships built by the State, some others being privateers sailing under commissions known as "letters of marque and reprisal," a third class being fast-sailing small boats used for slipping through the British blockade and importing articles needed by the colonists (their cargoes ranging from cannon and gunpowder to French finery and West Indian rum), and still another type of craft being "row-galleys," used for river fights and for unloading American ships which were too large to come into the inland waterways. Among the North Carolina ships of that period were the King Tammany, commanded by Captain Sylvanus Pendleton (who later commanded the eighteen-gun ship Bellona) ; the Pennsylvania Farmer, commanded by Captain Joshua Hempstead; the King Fisher, commanded by Captain James Ducaine; the General Washington, commanded by Captain John Forster; the Joseph, commanded by Captain Emperor Moseley; and the Polly, commanded by Captain John Chase. Then there were the Lilly, whose name was later changed to the Caswell (Captain Willis Wilson), and the Johnston (Captain Edward Tinker)—these ships being namesakes of the Revolutionary leaders Richard Caswell and Samuel Johnston. A similar compliment was paid Thomas Burke in 1782 by naming a New Bern privateer the Governor Burke, Peter Raingenoire being her captain and William Savage owner. In thanking Mr. Savage for this token of friendship, Governor Burke wrote: "I am sorry you have determined to give your vessel a name so unfortunate as that you mentioned, and should be much concerned if her fate should in any way resemble his after whom you intend to call her—which is to have laboured much for the public, to his own irretrievable disadvantage."

Among the vessels owned by Henry Montfort, of Edenton (formerly of Halifax), was one called the Willing Maid, and another with a name somewhat less sentimental—the Savage.

The aforementioned Captain Hempstead seems to have had command of quite a flotilla of North Carolina ships, as we find an order of the State Committee of Safety directing him "immediately to proceed to sea with the armed vessels under his command" for operations in the West Indies, whence the "Jamaica Fleet" was about to sail for some of the neutral ports of Europe, with one twenty-gun ship as its only convoy.

In speaking of the Pennsylvania Farmer, it is worthy of note that on it was a detachment of marines, commanded by Captain Robert Turner. When this officer asked to be transferred to the land forces, Colonel Joseph Leech and Captain Hempstead, under date of June 3, 1777, wrote of him: "He hath been out in the service of his country as a Captain of Marines on board the brig Pennsylvania Farmer, and always behaved well in his station." Captain Hance Bond succeeded to the command of the Marines on board the Pennsylvania Farmer after the transfer of Captain Turner. Another officer in the Marine service of North Carolina was Captain Samuel Gardner.

Naval activities in North Carolina increased still more as the war wore on. On May 16, 1777, Joseph Hewes wrote from Edenton to Governor Caswell, at New Bern, asking him to send some commissions signed in blank for the use of the ships being fitted out in that place. Hewes said: "There are several persons now here who wish to get commissions for armed vessels that they are fitting out. They can get good security here; but, being strangers at New Bern, might meet with some difficulty there." To the same effect, wrote Michael Payne, of Edenton, on that date: "Several merchants of this place are at this time fitting out armed vessels, and are desirous to have for them letters of marque."

Joseph Hewes, mentioned above (one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence), was for some years a member of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, and his thorough knowledge of nautical matters gained for him a position of commanding influence in that body on committees considering subjects connected with sea-faring operations. I shall have more to say of him later on.

One noted North Carolina privateer bore the ludicrous name Sturdy Beggar. She was fitted out in New Bern and commanded by Captain James Campbell. She mounted fourteen carriage guns, and was manned by one hundred seamen and marines. That this ship was considered "beggarly" only in name we may infer from an advertisement in the North Carolina Gazette, on August 8, 1777, which declared that she "was allowed to be the handsomest vessel ever built in America." The Pennsylvania Farmer, already mentioned, was not a privateer, but one of the ships belonging to the State Navy. She carried sixteen guns and eighty men. Among the ships in North Carolina, not already enumerated, were the Heart of Oak, commanded by Captain George Dennison; the Resolution, commanded by Captain Joseph Meredith; the Lydia, commanded by Captain Appleton; the Lord Chatham, commanded by Captain John Cheshire; the Rainbow, commanded by Captain Martin Ferns; the Fanny, commanded by Captain Thomas Alderson; the Betsey, commanded by Captain Ishol Tinker; the General Nash, commanded by Captain Deshon; the General Gates, commanded by Captain Cunningham; the New Bern, commanded by Captain Cochran Amit (Amyett?), and the Eclipse, commanded by Captain Charles Biddle. These vessels brought a tremendous amount of needed supplies to the State, besides making themselves useful to the American cause by preying on the commerce of the enemy. Occasionally one had the misfortune to be captured or suffer shipwreck. Describing a calamity of the latter nature, in a letter to Governor Caswell, under date of December 10, 1778, Robert Smith, of Edenton, said: "I am sorry to inform you that the brig General Gates, Captain Cunningham, in the lattitude of Bermuda, had the misfortune to be overset and totally lost. Whether captain and crew were saved or not we know not, but are anxious about their safety, as there were on board six young gentlemen of the first families and best expectations in this part of the country, who went volunteers to try their fortune."

The ships fitted out in North Carolina cruised over a much greater area than might be expected. They were continually going to the West Indies, and sometimes crossed the Atlantic to the neutral countries of Europe. In December, 1778, the North Carolina ship Caswell formed part of an American fleet raised for an attack on East Florida.

In July, 1778, a ship called the Holy Heart of Jesus, commanded by Captain William Boritz, came from some European country to North Carolina with a cargo of cannon. Twenty-three of these were purchased by North Carolina, and twenty-two by Virginia. Some of these may still be seen in Edenton. Two were presented by that town to the State, and these interesting relics are now mounted on stone bases on the south side of the Capitol in Raleigh. A touch of Civil War history attaches to them from the fact that the United States forces broke off the trunnions for fear the Confederate troops might make use of them—an operation which would have been about as dangerous to the "man behind the gun" as the ones in front of it.

It is greatly to be regretted that so little record remains of the enterprise and prowess displayed by North Carolina seamen during the course of the war. Their operations were both on the high seas and in home waters. Josiah Martin, who still claimed to be Royal Governor of North Carolina, though he had been driven out of the colony, wrote to the home government, from his place of refuge in New York, that while British warships were watching the approaches to large sea-coast cities in America, "the contemptible port of Ocracoke" had become a great channel of supply to the rebels. This warning did not go unheeded, and the blockade around North Carolina was drawn tighter. The North Carolinians, however—who were familiar with the devious channels of the various sounds, rivers, and inlets of their State—were more than equal to the new difficulties by which they were beset. Sometimes they slipped by the British fleet, under the cover of night; sometimes outran their pursuers in an ocean race; and, when odds against them were not too large, would fight to a finish with the "pirates," as they called the British sea forces. American victories were by no means uncommon occurrences, and occasioned great rejoicing. The naval forces, too, vied with the landsmen in annually celebrating the birthday of American Independence in a manner by no means "safe and sane." On the Fourth of July, 1778, John Wright Stanly and Richard Ellis (large ship-owners of New Bern) had cannon placed on their wharves and fired all day, with the usual addition of "liquor given to the populace." Colonel

Richard Cogdell, in referring to the celebration, wrote: "Stanly and Ellis seemed to vie with each other in a contest as to who should do the most honor to the day, but Mr. Ellis had the most artillery."

Of the individual acts of enterprise and heroism displayed by North Carolina seamen, the records tell but little. One marvelous case of spirit and fortitude, however, has been recorded and is well worthy of mention. John Davis—son of the old public printer, James Davis, of New Bern—was in the naval service of North Carolina and was captured in 1780 by the British, who held him captive on a ship off the coast of South Carolina. The captain attempted to compel the American prisoners to do duty on shipboard, and Davis peremptorily refused to obey his orders. Thereupon he was severely beaten, and then was told that the punishment would be renewed unless he would signify his obedience to the captain's orders by drawing a bucket of water from the ship's side. To this he defiantly replied: "If His Majesty's whole Navy was on fire, and one bucket of water, drawn by me, would extinguish the flames, I would not draw it." This answer so enraged the captain that he directed Davis again to be flogged, and declared that the beating should not cease until the prisoner agreed to obey the orders which had been given him. This command was carried out with such inhuman brutality that the body of Davis was almost torn asunder, but his Spartan fortitude never gave way under the prolonged torture, and he died from its effects in a short while. More than half a century after his death, some of the friends of Davis had a record of the circumstances of his heroic conduct entered on the minutes of Craven County, at New Bern.

Of Joseph Hewes, of North Carolina, member of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, I have already spoken; and it may not be altogether amiss to add a few more words concerning him. He entered the Continental Congress as early as 1774, and (with one year's exception) served until his death in 1779. As member of the Naval Committee and

Marine Committee in that body, he had more to do with organizing those departments of the new government than any other man. The Philadelphia historian Judson, in his well-known work entitled Sages and Heroes of the American Revolution, refers to the Congressional services of Mr. Hewes as follows: "He was upon several of the most important committees. Upon the one for fitting out a naval armament he stood in the front rank. He was virtually the first Secretary of the Navy. With scanty funds he speedily fitted out eight armed vessels. He was very active in raising supplies in his own State to strengthen the sinews of war and oil the wheels of the general government." The severe labors of Mr. Hewes finally undermined his health and ultimately caused his death. When he obtained a temporary leave from the Continental Congress in September, 1776, his colleagues Hooper and Penn wrote of him: "After a long and diligent attendance in Congress and the different committees of which he has been a member, he is now upon his return home. From the large share of naval and mercantile business which has been allotted to his attention by Congress, his health has been much injured." It was Hewes who secured for the great naval hero, John Paul Jones, his first commission as an officer of the American Navy. Among the official letter-books of the Governors of North Carolina, now preserved in Raleigh, is one letter to Governor Samuel Johnston from Congressman Robert Burton, of date January 28, 1789 (during the lifetime of Jones), wherein the writer said: "As those men who have fought and bled for us in the late contest cannot be held in too high esteem, and as the Chevalier John Paul Jones is among the foremost who derived their appointment from this State, * * * I take the liberty of offering to the State as a present, through you, its Chief Magistrate, the bust of that great man." Governor Johnston replied: "I will readily accept it on behalf of the State, and will communicate your letter to the next Assembly." What became of this bust, if Colonel Burton ever carried out his intention of sending it, is not known. It may have been destroyed when the old Capitol, at Raleigh, was burned in 1831. In the above connection it may be added that several most interesting autograph letters from John Paul Jones to Hewes are now preserved in the files of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

This closes the all too brief record I have been able to make of the hardy seamen whose enterprise, daring, and devotion, contributed so much to the important part North Carolina was able to play in the great War for American Independence. These old rangers of the ocean have long since been called from the labors and hardships of this life—some perishing by sea, amid the raging elements or crash of battle, and some resting in neglected and unmarked graves on the bosom of mother earth. It is true that they had their faults, as sailors are but human; yet, in view of all their patriotic services we, who are still permitted to enjoy the blessings of the liberty they helped to win, should let charitable oblivion cover their shortcomings (whatever they may have been), and wish for each brave voyager a safe and happy haven hereafter:

"At the piping of all hands,
When the judgment-signal's spread—
When the islands and the lands
And the seas give up their dead."

Review of The Prince of Parthia

By Nina Holland Covington.

The reputation of Dr. Archibald Henderson as one of the most brilliant of our modern literary critics extends into other countries than our own, and North Carolina is very proud of her distinguished son, but the most pleasing part to us about Dr. Henderson's literary work and researches is that he takes the greatest pleasure in writing about people and events of his own native State, and is never so happy as when he has brought out from obscurity and semi-oblivion some North Carolinian who has achieved something worth while.

We confess to a complete ignorance on the subject of The Prince of Parthia, and its author Thomas Godfrey, until we picked up that delightfully "gotten-up" edition of the play with its introductory monograph. With painstaking care the history of the life of the young author—Godfrey was only twenty-three when The Prince of Parthia was written—has been brought out by Dr. Henderson, and as we read the interesting narrative of this youthful genius we realize, for the first time, that Wilmington and North Carolina deserve prominent place on the literary map of America, for in Wilmington, the first American tragedy was written, and in Wilmington also its author, the young Godfrey, is buried.

Following the monograph—a model of clear style and interesting biography—is the text of the play itself and even a hurried reading of the production will show how important the play is. The work of a boy hardly out of his teens, it shows merit of no mean order, and causes us to regret the death of Godfrey at the age of twenty-six as a distinct loss to American drama, for The Prince of Parthia—his first production—would possibly have been followed by other plays, had not death ended the young poet's career.

Aside from the merit of the play and the interest of the narrative of Godfrey's life, the 1917 edition of The Prince of Parthia bears clear evidence to the statement made by the publishers in their announcement of the work:

> The original and only edition of Godfrey's play ever published, which likewise includes his poems, was brought out by his fellow-poet, the Reverend Nathaniel Evans, in 1765. This edition is excessively rare and virtually unprocurable. The present edition is primarily due to the loving interest and elaborate researches of Dr. Archibald Henderson, one of the most distinguished of living dramatic critics. In an extended introduction, which is itself a monograph, he for the first time narrates the fascinating story of young Godfrey's life, and with deft strokes paints the artistic and literary background of society, in the cultured circles of Philadelphia and Wilmington, against which the figure of the young poet and dramatist stands forth radiant and distinct.
> At this time when a concerted effort is being made by the Drama League of America and other forces, to project the American drama into the focus of national consciousness, the publication of the play is an event of importance.

Not only on the map of early American literature does North Carolina deserve place. With an O. Henry, a Dr. Henderson, a Margaret Busbee Shipp to boast of, besides many others whose excellent work in literature, the old North State is taking prominent part in the literary history of the Nation.

Not until recent years did North Carolina realize the richness of her agricultural resources. May the time soon come when she will estimate at full value the importance of literary achievements. The Patterson Cup—given by one of our public spirited women—is a step in the right direction.

It seems to us that there would be no better investment for some of our millionaires than for them to donate a few thousands (if no more) for the substantial aid of young writers struggling to gain foothold on the very treacherous and slippery Hill of Fame.

During the summer of 1801 there appeared a notice in The North Carolina Mercury and Salisbury Advertiser (August 6) announcing the recent wedding of "Archibald Henderson, Esq., Member of Congress, to the amiable Miss Sally Alexander, both of this town." The union of the Henderson and Alexander families was doubly sealed by the marriage of William Lee Alexander, a native of Mecklenburg County, brother of Archibald Henderson's wife, with Elizabeth Henderson, Archibald Henderson's sister. In describing his acquaintances in Salisbury during the last decade of the century, Dr. Charles Caldwell says: "Henderson had two sisters, by far the most accomplished women of the place. . . . . One of them was married (Fanny, to Spruce Macay), and the other (Elizabeth) single. I sincerely admired both . . . and passed in their society many delightful hours." Sarah and William Lee Alexander, whose brother was Dr. Nathaniel Alexander of Mecklenburg, a graduate of Princeton, afterwards Member of Congress and Governor of North Carolina, were the children of Colonel

Moses Alexander, first High Sheriff of Mecklenburg County and Colonel of the County Militia until his death in 1772, and his wife, Sarah, daughter of William and Jane Taylor Alexander. This Jane Taylor Alexander was descended from John Alexander, the youngest son of the first Earl of Stirling, who married Miss Graham of Gartmore, Scotland, and emigrated to America in 1659, settling in Stafford County, Virginia, in 1660. Moses Alexander was of the Caledon branch established in Ireland; and his grandmother was, with several sons, among the first to purchase and colonize a large tract of land in Cecil County, Maryland. She fled with others from Munster, the Earl of Stirling having suffered attainder, together with several thousand, from earls to yeomen, during the Dublin Parliament of James II.* The three brothers, Moses, Nathaniel, and Daniel Alexander, shortly after 1750 settled on Rocky River, then in Anson County, afterwards Mecklenburg, now Cabarrus. Nathaniel Alexander, who held the rank of Captain in the North Carolina militia, under the command of Col. Hugh Waddell, was active in protecting the Rowan frontiers against Indian incursions during the French and Indian War. William Lee Alexander, a student at Princeton, a lieutenant in the Continental line during the Revolution, and a very distinguished lawyer in his day, resided for some years in Salisbury; and his sister, Sarah, was doubtless living in his home at the time of her marriage to Archibald Henderson.†

Three children blessed the happy union of Archibald and Sarah Alexander. An early sorrow of their married life was the loss in infancy of a son, named Roger Griswold for Mr. Henderson's warm friend and colleague in Congress, the distinguished Federalist of Connecticut. Two children who survived were Archibald and Jane Caroline. Archibald, who was born on January 8, 1811, was educated at Yale (1826-28) and at the University of Virginia (1828-31), from which latter he was graduated in the School of Moral Philosophy, July 16, 1831. On December 14, 1840, he was married to Mary Steele Ferrand, a granddaughter of General John Steele. Jane Caroline, a fascinating belle of North Carolina society, was married in November, 1845, to the Hon. Nathaniel Boyden, a native of Massachusetts, afterwards Member of Congress from North Carolina, and Associate Justice of the North Carolina Supreme Court.

About eight o'clock on Monday night, October 21, 1822, Archibald Henderson, at the age of fifty-four, died at his home in Salisbury. In honor to his memory, the Justices of the Supreme Court of North Carolina and the members of the bar in attendance upon the Court unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we have heard, with the deepest sorrow, of the melancholy event which, since the last term, has taken from our country its distinguished citizen and deprived us of our much esteemed associate, ARCHIBALD HENDERSON, ESQ.

Resolved, That as a token of respect for the memory of our deceased friend, we will wear crepe on the left arm for one month.*

In the Raleigh Register of November 1, 1822, the following obituary notice appeared:

DIED,

At Salisbury, in this state, after a very short illness, Archibald Henderson, Esq., Counsellor at Law. This Gentleman's death is a public loss, for he was one of the most distinguished Members of the Bar in the State, and a man of unblemished integrity and honour. To his family his loss is irreparable, whether we consider the breach in their domestic happiness, or the deprivation of his eminent talents.

On Wednesday, October 23, at a meeting of the directors of the State Bank of North Carolina, Salisbury Branch, of which Archibald Henderson had long been president, the following preamble and resolutions were introduced by Col. Thomas G. Polk and unanimously adopted:

The Directors of this Branch Bank, deeply penetrated with the magnitude of the loss which the institution, in common with the State, has sustained in the death of their much respected President, Archibald Henderson, Esquire, do hereby resolve,—

1st. That they have ever entertained the highest veneration for his virtues, his talents and his integrity.

2d. That, in testimony of the high regard they feel for his character, they will, together with the other officers of this Bank, wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.

3d. That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Western Carolinian, under the direction of the Cashier.

JUNIUS SNEED, *Cashier.

At Lincolnton, on Friday, October 25, the members of the bar in attendance on the Superior Court, held a memorial meeting attended by John R. Donnell, the presiding judge. At this meeting, over which the Hon. Joseph Wilson, Solicitor General, presided, with James Graham as secretary, the following resolution, of several, was passed:

Resolved, as the unanimous and deeply felt sense of this meeting, that we consider the death of Archibald Henderson a severe affliction, not only to his professional brethren and friends, but to all who knew him in the wide range of his usefulness. Recollecting his pure and spotless integrity, his profound erudition in the science of the Law, his unequalled powers as an Advocate, the distinguished urbanity of his manners, and his frankness in imparting to others from the vast store of his legal learning; and remembering how uniformly his transcendent talents and virtues have been devoted to the best interests of our country, his death we deplore as a great national loss.†

XV.

In all that has been said, thus far, of the man, his life, character, and political record, no account has been given of his career as a lawyer. Yet it was as a lawyer that he left a profound impression upon his contemporaries and bequeathed to posterity a repute that may well be regarded as enviable. After the lapse of a century, it is extraordinarily difficult to pierce the veil of the past and see the great lawyer in his habit as he lived. Had he been Supreme Court Justice, his written opinions would serve as memorial of his legal learning and mental attainments. But as advocate and counsellor, he must rely for renown solely upon the judgment of his contemporaries. Like the actor who (before the days of phonographs and motion pictures) must rest his fame on the immediate impressions created upon the hearts and minds of his audience in the theater, the lawyer achieves high repute almost exclusively through the opinions of his gifts as orator, logician, scholar, and advocate, handed down through the graphic pictures of contemporary record, vivid memory, or constant and authentic tradition, caught in the purlieus of the law courts or in the halls of justice. In recognition of this immitigable limitation, the effort will here be made to give a faithful picture of Archibald Henderson, the advocate and legal counsellor, as mirrored in the minds and hearts of his contemporaries.

"Who now knows anything of Archibald Henderson, familiarly known as 'Baldy' Henderson fifty years ago?" once asked the late Col. R. B. Creecy. "He was the great lawyer of his time in North Carolina. . . . And yet, great as he undoubtedly was, interesting as was his private and personal history, and full of useful lessons as was the whole story of his life, we have never seen any mention of him in any enduring record." Fortunately there has been preserved in an "enduring record," not an account of Henderson's life and career, which is nowhere to be found, but an estimate of his character as lawyer, citizen, and publicist. As an analysis of moral qualities and an appraisal of civic virtues, this essay in character-delineation is unsurpassed in the entire range of our North Carolina literature. It is the obituary account, or more accurately speaking, essay in psycho-analysis, published at the time of Henderson's death by his close friend and warm admirer, Judge Archibald D. Murphey, over the pen name of "Philo Florian."* Four years later, the same brilliant publicist, one of the most distinguished scholars and broad-visioned, forward-looking men ever born in North Carolina, drew a gallery of admirable pen-pictures of North Carolina characters in his justly famous oration at Chapel Hill (June 27, 1827). In this address at the University of North Carolina, Judge Murphey describes Archibald Henderson as "upon the whole, the most perfect model of a lawyer that our bar has produced." In an interesting letter commenting upon that address, Chief Justice John Marshall, who for thirty-odd years presided over the Federal Circuit Court and had often heard Archibald Henderson at the bar, pronounced him as being "unquestionably among the ablest lawyers of his day." Upon another occasion, Marshall pronounced Henderson "one of the great lawyers of the Nation." At the time of Henderson's death, because of the universal recognition of his eminence as a lawyer, Judge Murphey urged that a monument to his memory be erected by the bar of the State. This monument, which bears the memorable epitaph written by Murphey, was so erected, and is still standing in the old "Lutheran Graveyard" at Salisbury. It is believed to be the only monument to a lawyer as such, ever erected in North Carolina and by the bar of the State.

That shrewd student and astute critic of men and affairs, David L. Swain, in describing the bar of North Carolina, cited Archibald Henderson, Thomas Ruffin, Archibald D. Murphey, William Gaston, Joseph Wilson, Judge Seawell, Gavin Hogg, and Moses Mordecai as the greatest lawyers of the day practising before the Supreme Court. Archibald Henderson is characterised as "probably the most eloquent and successful advocate in criminal offenses, who ever appeared at the bar in North Carolina."* As an orator, he has been spoken of as one who "sustained the character of the profession for legal learning and general literature." The Hon. Burton Craige, who had often seen and heard Henderson at the bar, once said that "he never spoke more than an hour in any case, but that every word that he uttered was an argument, every sentence eloquence in its true sense, the power of conviction." If his contemporaries and the immediately succeeding generation are to be credited, Mr. Henderson must have especially excelled as an advocate. John W. Moore, the historian of North Carolina, says that he was "one of the very greatest advocates North Carolina has produced. . . . Mr. Henderson classes as an advocate with William Hooper, Governor Davie, Judge Badger, and Governor Bragg, and was perhaps of larger influence as a practicing lawyer than any of them."

When a young man, Henderson incurred an injury to the trachea, which impaired the naturally fine tone of his voice. Despite this handicap, says Dr. Caldwell, "the strength and compass of his mind, his sagacity and penetration, and his power in analysis and argument, and readiness in debate were undiminished, and they all increased with his advancement in years and experience, until he ultimately rose to the head of the bar in North Carolina, and retained that station to the close of his life." Men have spoken of "the impetuous torrent of his eloquence which captivated juries"; and Judge Murphey, whose language is more nicely discriminating, thus details his attributes as an advocate: "His style and manner of speaking at the bar were extremely impressive. . . . He always came to the trial of causes well prepared; and if the state of his health or his want of preparation were likely to jeopardize his reputation in the management of his client's case he would decline the trial until a more favorable time. The courts in which he practiced, and his brother lawyers, understood the delicacy of his feelings upon this point so well that they extended to him the indulgence he required, and a knowledge of this part of his character gave confidence to his clients and attracted crowds of people to hear his speeches. When he rose at the bar no one expected to hear commonplace matter; no one looked for a cold, vapid, or phlegmatic harangue. His great excellence as a speaker consisted in an earnestness and dignity of manner and strong powers of reasoning. He seized one or two strong points, and these he illustrated and enforced. His exordium was short and appropriate; he quickly marched up to the great point in controversy, making no manœuvre as if he were afraid to approach it, or was desirous of attacking it by surprise. The confidence he exhibited of success he gradually imparted to his hearers; he grew more warm and earnest as he advanced in his argument, and seizing the critical moment for enforcing conviction, he brought forth his main argument, pressed it home and sat down."

The Hon. William A. Graham, who wrote excellent biographical studies of Archibald D. Murphey, George E. Badger, and Thomas Ruffin, and was eminently qualified to pronounce judgment upon the merits of North Carolina's leading lawyers, places Archibald Henderson, William Gaston, and George E. Badger at the head of the list. Of Thomas Ruffin, he says that for the period from 1818 to 1825, "he had hardly a rival in the bar of the Supreme Court of the State or the Circuit Court of the United States, except Archibald Henderson and Gaston." Of George E. Badger, he says: "At the bar of the State he wore the mantle of Gaston and Archibald Henderson for a much longer period than either, worthily and well, with no diminution of its honors."* The late Judge R. R. Heath, who was familiar with Henderson's history and personal characteristics, described him as "the greatest lawyer the State had produced before Mr. Gaston's time"; and the late Captain Charles Price, a lawyer of eminence, described him as "in his day the greatest lawyer of the State."

Certain distinctive qualities marked his career as a lawyer, and characterized his advocacy at the bar. "The sublime idea that he lived under a government of laws was forever uppermost in his mind," says Judge Murphey, "and seemed to give a coloring to all his actions." Respect for the court and its officers, reverence for and obedience to the laws; delicate conscientiousness in always endeavoring to live up to the highest ideals of the legal profession, in no matter how slight a case; intellectual and emotional sympathy with the mentality and sentiments of the average man—these were conspicuous attributes of his character. Perhaps nothing endeared him so much to the common people or so effectually won their hearty commendation as the oft-expressed conviction that "the laws were made for the people, and they should be interpreted and administered by rules which they understood, whenever it was practicable: that common sense belonged to the people in a higher degree than to learned men, and to interpret laws by rules which were at variance with the rules of common sense, necessarily lessened the respect of the people for the laws, and induced them to believe that courts and lawyers contrived mysteries in the science merely for the purpose of supporting the profession of lawyers." He was the inveterate foe of legal pedantry; and in his own practice he translated with rare clarity the mysteries of the law into the simple and expressive language of daily life.

XVI.

The fatal defect of much biographical literature, especially of the briefer sort, is the pointlessness of its panegyric. The subject furnishes the text for a cold catalogue of formal virtues; and the result is that the differentiating qualities, the distinguishing traits, of the individual character are wholly lost sight of. Replace the name of the person biographed by that of another character in the same sphere of activity, and, save for a few dates, the colorless virtues and glittering generalities associated with the original remain equally applicable to the substitute. In order to escape even a semblance of this singular, yet patent, defect of brief biography, a number of personal incidents descriptive of character, loosely called "anecdotes" by an earlier generation, may serve to give some conception of the deeper instincts and larger emotions of Archibald Henderson, the man.

Genuine insight into the character of an individual may be gained through a knowledge of the persons and characters who incarnate that individual's highest ideals. No man who ever lived in North Carolina, William Hooper not excepted, surpassed Archibald Henderson in exalted admiration for George Washington and profound veneration of his memory. Doubtless his first view of Washington at Salisbury in 1791, when he himself was in his early twenties, left upon him an impression so deep and moving as to tinge the whole fabric of his life and thinking.

When Fisher Ames, the distinguished Federalist, was given the congenial task of penning the answer of Congress to Washington's last message in December, 1797, he gave free play to his ardent Federalism and flowing rhetoric, lauding Washington's administration and pronouncing an eloquent eulogy of his life and services. The carping and bitter Virginian, William Branch Giles, supported by Nathaniel Macon, Andrew Jackson, and nine others, voted nay on the answer. Among other things, Giles ungraciously said that if others regretted the retirement of the Father of his Country, he for his part wished him to retire at once; and furthermore, that he thought the country would not suffer, as many men could fill the office of President with credit and advantage. The story is still told in Granville County that, when the news of Branch's speech against Ames's answer reached Williamsboro, Archibald Henderson, deeply incensed, declared that Giles's vote and sentiments "sprang from the oscillation of a wicked heart."

An incident which occurred at Salisbury testifies with equal vividness to Archibald Henderson's reverential estimate of the greatness of Washington. In preparing a series of toasts for the very elaborate July 4th celebration at Salisbury in 1803, General John Steele gave to the fourth toast the following form: "To our illustrious fellow citizen George Washington and the long list of Statesmen and Heroes who coöperated with him in the establishment of American independence." The toast was altered to read, simply, "To the Memory of General Washington"—in deference to the earnest representations of Archibald Henderson, who urged that "to connect with that name any other name or description of characters would derogate from the respect due to it."

Archibald Henderson was a great lover of learning, a diligent reader of the classics, and a profound student of law in its wider bearing upon the course of human history. In his richly stored library, teeming with works of history and the classics, were scores of volumes by the greatest legal authorities of Great Britain.* At the age of twenty-seven, along with General William R. Davie and Mr. James Hogg, the two men chiefly instrumental in the founding and location of the University of North Carolina, Archibald Henderson was elected a member of the Dialectic Society upon its organization in 1795. Throughout his life he remained a warm adherent of the University of North Carolina—although his own son studied at Yale and at the University of Virginia. When the General Assembly of 1800, as the result of the great hostility to the University aroused by the litigation under the act of 1794 to recover unsold confiscated lands, repealed this act and also the act of 1789, granting escheated property, Archibald Henderson was deeply distressed, and wrote to Walter Alves (Jan. 2, 1801): "Alas! alas! the Legislature of No. Carolina to wage war against the arts and sciences! I blush for my native State. My dear sir, this Phrenzy must be checked or our Country will be lost for ever. That spirit which agitated Europe for ten years and continues to convulse it seems to be exercising its all powerful energy in the U. States and particularly in No. C."†

During his lifetime, Archibald Henderson was not only held in popular esteem as a "philanthropic and worthy citizen," but was revered as being "remarkable for his benevolent qualities." The late Dr. Theodore Bryant Kingsbury, the author of an unpublished sketch of Granville County, says of him: "But few of the many able lawyers of our State ever so impressed their fellow men for uncommon powers as did this illustrious and admirable man. He was amiable and true and noble. . . ." Moore, the historian of North Carolina, says: "He was one of the very ablest lawyers ever seen in the State and possessed virtues to match his intelligence."* Many instances are recorded of his kindly and humane disposition, and his ready sympathy for those in sorrow and distress. Especially was this true in the case of the downtrodden, the afflicted, and the oppressed, whose heritage and environment coöperated in great measure to make of them lawbreakers and criminals.

*An appreciable portion of this library, the books bearing Archibald Henderson's book-plate, is still preserved.

†In 1809 Archibald and Leonard Henderson each subscribed one hundred dollars to aid in the completion of the South Building at the University.

Upon one occasion he was summoned to make the long journey from Salisbury to Smithfield, to prosecute a man for murder; and he was offered an extraordinarily large fee for his legal services. When he arrived at the court house, the prisoner's wife, who was dressed in black, saw and immediately recognized him. Knowing by reputation his almost uncanny skill as a criminal lawyer, the poor woman gave a shriek of horror, and throwing up her hands, exclaimed:

"My God, Mr. Henderson, have you come all this long way to convict my poor husband of murder?"

So touched and affected was he by this moving plea that he bowed his head, and abandoning the case, immediately left the court room. Mounting his sulky, he drove, in silent meditation, all the way back to Salisbury.†

Archibald Henderson was vigorously opposed to slavery, and believed that the intellectual, economic, and social progress of the South would continue to be seriously retarded so long as the negro remained enslaved. The sentiments in regard to slavery voiced by his friend, William Gaston, at the University of North Carolina in 1832, might well have been uttered by himself: "It stifles industry and represses enterprise; it is fatal to economy and providence; it discourages skill, impairs our strength as a community, and poisons morals at the fountain head." He heartily endorsed the principles of the American Colonization Society, the fundamental purposes of which were to encourage emancipation and to aid the emigration of the emancipated to Africa. It was believed that, as soon as an asylum should be found for the freed negroes, emancipation would steadily increase. The society began to establish branches in North Carolina in 1819, the work being under the direction of the Rev. William Meade, of Virginia, afterwards famous as Bishop. In Raleigh, according to the Rev. Mr. Meade's report to the society, he found "the same unanimity of sentiment (as at Fayetteville). The Supreme Court being in session, many of the judges and lawyers were collected from the different parts of the State, who cordially joined in the society and testified to the general prevalence of good will to it throughout the State. At a meeting for forming a constitution, the highest talents, authorities and wealth of the State were present, and unanimously sanctioned the measure."* Both Archibald and Leonard Henderson were vice-presidents of the Raleigh Society (1819), of which Governor Branch was president; and Major Pleasant Henderson was a vice-president of the Chapel Hill Society (1820), of which the Rev. Joseph Caldwell, President of the University of North Carolina, was president.†

So successful was Archibald Henderson in the pleading of a cause that at times he seemed to throw over his hearers an almost hypnotic spell, causing a temporary remission of judgment almost compelling conviction. A well-authenticated anecdote is related in connection with a case, in which he secured a verdict of acquittal for the defendant who was accused of stealing a pig. After the successful termination of the trial, Mr. Henderson asked his client:

"Well, sir, what is the truth about stealing this pig?"— to which his admiring client, with naive earnestness, replied:

†S. B. Weeks: Anti-Slavery Sentiment in the South. "Publications of the Southern History Association," II, 2; April, 1898.

"To tell you the truth, Mr. Henderson, before I heard you speak in my defense, I thought I had stolen that pig. But, sir, I frankly acknowledge now that you have fully convinced me of my own innocence."

The reputation he bore as a repository of legal lore sometimes had amusing consequences. An interesting character in Stokes County was the Lutheran-Moravian divine, Gottlieb Schober, a shrewd old German, who enjoyed considerable local repute as a rough-and-ready lawyer, and twice represented his county as Senator in the State Legislature. Upon one occasion a prospective client came to Schober and solicited his legal advice.

"The fee, mine friend," said Schober, "is five dollars."

On receiving the fee, the thrifty old German stuffed the money into his purse, snapped the clasp, dropped the purse into his pocket, and then leaning eagerly forward, said with great earnestness:

"You haf paid me for my legal advice, mine friend, and now I gif it to you. Go out of here, get on your horse, and ride as fast as you can to Salisbury. You go to see old Paldy Henderson. My legal advice to you, mine friend, is: Whatever old Paldy Henderson tells you to do—you do."

About the year 1815 a wide-spread network of crime, in the way of counterfeiting money and altering bank bills, spread over Western North Carolina. The center of this nefarious industry was in Rutherford County; and citizens of some prominence were said to have been implicated in the conspiracy. The terror of the counterfeiters was the great solicitor, Joseph Wilson, a man of "iron will, determined purpose, and massive intellectuality." For some years the counterfeiters flourished to an extent which baffles modern comprehension, and public opinion in condemnation of their practices was exceedingly difficult to arouse. "Early in 1822 indictments came thick and fast against the leaders of the band for 'deceit' and 'forgery,' and they employed Baldy Henderson, the astute criminal lawyer and peerless advocate, to defend them. He seized upon every pretext for continuance, and urged removal of the cases to different counties from those where the presentments originated. When their friend and counsellor, Mr. Henderson, died in October of the same year, before having secured their acquittal, these strong desperate men wept like children, declaring that 'Baldy Henderson was their only hope of escape from the hands of Joe Wilson, the prosecutor.' "*

Archibald Henderson had an immense legal practice, before the Federal Circuit Court, presided over by John Marshall, before the Supreme Court of the State, and in the Superior Courts. In important cases, men of the stamp of Waightstill Avery, William Duffy, Archibald D. Murphey, Frederick Nash, William Gaston, Henry Seawell, Thomas Ruffin, and Gavin Hogg were associated with him; and he and Gaston crossed swords upon more than one memorable occasion in the halls of the Supreme Court. Henderson's greatest legal victories, it is believed, were made without the assistance of counsel, and his power in clearing some desperate criminal from the clutches of the law seemed to be almost akin to wizardry. One of his best remembered achievements is the clearing of the infamous desperado, Nixon Curry, a notorious thief and murderer. In the eyes of his friends, Curry, who was utterly fearless, appeared as a hero; and the case, when it finally came up for trial at Morganton at the Spring term of the court in 1821, filled the court room with a dense and excited throng.

"Baldy Henderson conducted the defence in a forensic effort of great adroitness and power. He commenced by frankly admitting that the prisoner's character was blackened by every crime known to the law, but reminded the jurors that they were under the sanctity of an oath to try him for the particular offence of which he was accused, and no other. He also appealed to them to divest themselves of prejudice and dismiss preconceived opinions. As a slave was not allowed to testify in a court of justice the evidence of the negro who had seen Curry just previous to the killing of (Ben)

Wilson, was excluded; and Curry while in jail or in hiding, having married Dovey Caldwell, effectually silenced her as a witness, the wife being debarred by law from giving testimony against her husband. Without these two important witnesses, the State could not make out a very strong case, and the jury returned a Scotch verdict, of guilty, but not proven.

"After the termination of the trial, the sheriff accompanied Curry to the room of the attorney who had secured his acquittal, and in order to show his appreciation Curry emptied a pocket full of gold upon the table and begged his advocate to help himself. Without any ceremony, Mr. Henderson swept the whole amount into the drawer; and when Curry mildly suggested that the charge was pretty steep, 'Old Baldy' is reported to have emphatically answered: 'No, it will take every dollar to wash my hands clean of your infernal rascality.' "*

Archibald Henderson had unbounded reverence for the law, and implicit faith in the essential virtue and justice of the courts. He always carried a cane with ivory head upon which was a silver plate, bearing the inscription which he held as his motto: Fiat Justitia Ruat Cœlum—"Let justice be done, though the heavens fall." His son was astonished to learn one day that, although he was esteemed a great lawyer, he had never taken the precaution to make a will. When the matter came up for discussion, Mr. Henderson summarily disposed of the question with the quiet assurance:

"My son, the law makes the best will."

The other portrait is the opening paragraph of the essay of "Philo Florian":

"I became acquainted with Archibald Henderson in the year 1803, and from that time to the time of his death, I looked to him as a model of that perfect character in the profession of the law which all his brethren should be ambitious to imitate. From him, judges might learn wisdom and discretion, and lawyers the dignity of their profession and the high duties which it imposes. I here speak only of his professional character; that which he exhibited to his country for more than twenty years, with a force and effect that ought to be remembered as long as a reverence for our civil institutions shall be cherished. No man could look upon him without pronouncing him one of the great men of the age. The impress of greatness was upon his countenance; not that greatness which is the offspring of any single talent, or moral quality; but a greatness which is made up by blending the faculties of a fine intellect with exalted moral feelings. Although he was at all times accessible, and entirely free from austerity, he seemed to live and move in an atmosphere of dignity. He exacted nothing by his manner; yet all approached him with reverence, and left him with respect. The little quarrels and contests of men were beneath him: their bickerings, their envyings, their slanderings, and all the workings of their little passions kept at a distance from him: and I have often seen him discomfited at the bar, when contending for his clients, in cases where the little passions only had play. His was the region of high sentiment; and there he occupied a standing that was preëminent in North Carolina. He contributed more than any man since the time of General Davie and Alfred Moore, to give character to the bar of the state, and to impress upon the people a reverence for their courts of justice. His career at the bar has become identified with the history of North Carolina, and his life and his example furnish themes for instruction both to gentlemen of the bench and to his brethren of the bar. May they study his life and profit by his example!"

APPENDIX.

Speech of Archibald Henderson, of North Carolina, Opening the Debate on the Judiciary Bill in the House of Representatives.*

On Monday, February 15, 1802, Mr. Davis called for the order of the day, on the Judiciary Bill from the Senate. On this day, several motions for postponement or adjournment were lost.

On Tuesday, February 16, the great debate was opened by the speech of Mr. Archibald Henderson, of North Carolina, as follows:

Mr. Henderson. I should not rise to offer my opinion on the great question now before the committee, were I not placed in a situation different from that in which I have been since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. The legislature of the State of North Carolina, one of whose representatives I am on this floor, have seen proper to instruct their Senators, and to recommend to their representatives in Congress, to use their exertions to procure a repeal of the law passed the last session of Congress, for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States; and as the bill on your table has for its object the repeal of this law, and as I shall probably vote against its passage, a decent respect for the opinions of those who have framed and sent forward those resolutions, demand that I should give the reasons which influence my conduct.

And here, Sir, I cannot forbear lamenting extremely that I should unfortunately be placed in a situation where the highest obligations of duty compel me to act in opposition to the wishes of that community to which I immediately belong. It is certainly of great importance that as public function-

*The text of Archibald Henderson's speech, as here given, is reproduced from a rare volume, entitled: DEBATES in the Congress of the United States on the BILL for repealing the LAW "for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," During the First Session of the Seventh Congress, and a List of the Yeas and Nays on that Interesting Subject. aries we should not only discharge those trusts committed to us with fidelity, and for the general good, but in such a manner as to give satisfaction to those for whom we are acting.

And if I know the feelings of my own heart, I declare, that next to the consciousness of having performed my duty with uprightness, my highest satisfaction is the knowledge that in the discharge of this duty I meet the approbation of my fellow men. But, Sir, if this approbation is only to be obtained by the unconditional surrender of my understanding, and the violation of my oath, I hope I shall be excused if I do not make this sacrifice at the altar of public opinion. Indeed, Sir, were I disposed to forego my own opinion, and adopt that of the legislature of my own state, were I inclined to say, thy will be done and not mine, I should first demand of them an absolution from the oath which I have taken to support the constitution of the United States. As long as that oath is binding on me, I see an insuperable objection to my acting in conformity to their wishes.

I will further remark, Sir, that I am not a little surprised that that august body should have undertaken to decide on a question not necessarily before them, without having an opportunity of hearing the arguments which may be used here either on one side or the other. I will not permit myself for a moment to believe the measure originated in a want of confidence in those who represent the State and the people in this assembly. And yet, if that confidence exists, the reasons for this procedure do not immediately present themselves to the mind.

I hope, Sir, it will not be understood that I mean to cast the most distant shade of disrespect on that body. I feel too great respect for the legislature of my native State to be guilty of such an attempt. No doubt but they were influenced by the purest and most correct understanding. It does not follow, by any means, that because my weak and feeble mind cannot discover perfect propriety in the conduct of men, that therefore it does not exist.

Having premised thus much, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed to an examination of the question under consideration. It has been usual to divide it into two parts; first, the expediency; and secondly, the authority of Congress to pass the law on the table. This is a natural and correct division; but I shall invert the order of considering the question, and first examine our power to act, before we consider the expediency of acting. And if, after a calm and candid review of the constitution, it should be found that we are prohibited from passing the bill, there will be no necessity for inquiring into the expediency of repealing the law passed last session of Congress for organizing our courts of justice. The relative merits of the old and new judiciary system will be entirely out of view. For I am confident that there is not a member of this body who would wish to pass the bill on your table, if in doing it we must violate the sacred charter under which we are now assembled.

The people of America have obtained and established, that the powers of government shall be vested in three great departments; the Legislative, the Executive and the Judicial. They have said, that there shall be a House of Representatives, the members of which shall be chosen by the people of the several states every second year. Though this House is composed of members chosen by the people immediately; though they can have no other interest than the great community from which they were sent; though they must return to the common mass in the short period of two years; yet enlightened America did not see proper to entrust the power of making laws to this body alone; they knew that the history of man, and the experience of ages, bore testimony against the safety of committing this high power to any one assembly not checked by some other body. They have therefore erected another branch of the legislature, called the Senate, the members of which are not to be elected by the people immediately, but by the sovereignties of the several states; they are to be chosen for six years, and not for two; and the qualifications requisite to entitle those to a seat, is different from that of a member of this House. To these bodies are given the power of initiating all laws; but after a bill has passed both of these Houses, before it becomes of binding obligation on the nation, it must be approved of by the President; it is a dead letter, until life is given by the executive. The President is elected not by the people, but by the legislatures of the several states, not by either House of Congress, but by electors chosen by the people. He is to hold his office during four years. This is the second great department of the government. It will be easily discovered from this cursory view of our constitution, the caution and jealousy with which the people have conferred the power of making laws, of commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong. But, Sir, after this law was made, after its authoritative mandate was acknowledged by the nation, it became necessary to establish some tribunal to judge of the extent and obligation of this law. The people did not see proper to entrust this power of judging of the meaning of their laws either to the legislative, or to the executive; because they all participated in the making of these laws; and experience had shown, that it is essential for the preservation of liberty, that the judicial and legislative authorities should be kept separate and distinct. They therefore enacted a third department, called the Judicial, and said that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." It is admitted, I understand, by all parties, by every description of persons, that these words, shall hold their offices during good behavior, are intended as a limitation of power. The question is, what power is thus to be limited and checked? I answer, that all and every power which would have had the authority of impairing the tenure by which the judges hold their offices, (if these words were not inserted) is checked and limited by these words; whether that power should be found to reside in Congress, or in the executive. The words are broad and extensive in their signification, and can only be satisfied by being construed to control the legislative as well as the executive power. But gentlemen contend that they must be confined to limiting the power of the President. I ask gentlemen, what is there in the constitution to prove their signification to this end alone? When you erect a court and fill it with a judge, and tell him, in plain simple language, that he shall hold his office during good behavior, or as long as he shall behave well; what, I beseech you, Sir, will any man, whose mind is not bewildered in the mazes of modern metaphysics, infer from the declaration? Certainly that the office will not be taken from him until he misbehaves; nor that he will be taken from the office during his good behavior. Under this impression he enters upon his duty, performing it with the most perfect satisfaction to all persons who have business before him; and the legislature, without whispering a complaint, abolishes the office and thereby turns out the judge. The judge is told: this is no violation of the compact, although you have behaved well, although we have promised that as long as you did behave well you should continue in office; yet, there is now no further necessity for your services, and you may retire. These words, "during good behavior," are intended to prevent the President from dismissing you from office, and not the legislature from destroying your office. Do you suppose, Sir, that there is a man of common understanding in the nation, whose mind is not alive to the influence of party spirit, that would yield his assent to this reasoning? I hope and believe there is not. But, Sir, how is it proved that the President would have had the power of removing the judges from their office, if these words, "during good behavior," had not been inserted in the constitution? Are there any words in that instrument which give the President expressly the power of removing any officer at pleasure? If there are, I call upon gentlemen to point them out; it does not result from the fashionable axiom, that the power which can create, can destroy. The President can nominate, but he can appoint to office only by the advice and consent of the Senate. Therefore, it would follow, if the power of displacing results from that of creating, that the Senate should participate in displacing as well as creating officers. But however this may be, it is certainly a mere constructive power which he has exercised, because the legislature have, from motives of expediency, acknowledged that he had it. If the constitution does not necessarily give the President the right of removing officers at pleasure, and if that right depend upon legislative acts or constructions, where would have been the necessity for inserting these emphatic words as a check and limitation of executive power, when without them the President has no such power? You are taking great pains to control a power which does not exist. The persons who framed our constitution knew that a power of removal in ordinary cases must exist somewhere. They took care, therefore, that in whatever hands it might fall, the language of the constitution respecting the tenure of the office of a judge should be co-extensive with the whole power of removal, whether it should reside in one or in more hands.

But, Sir, these words, during good behavior, are familiar to the American people. When the political bands which united us with Great Britain were burst asunder, and we assumed among the nations of the earth an independent station, most, if not all the states introduced these words into their constitutions. They were deemed essential, and a meaning has been stamped upon them which it is not in the power of this House to change. Let us for a moment examine some of the state constitutions, and see what signification must of necessity be given to these words. I will first advert to the constitution of North Carolina, as being one with which I am best acquainted. In that instrument it is said, "that the General Assembly shall, by joint ballot of both Houses, appoint judges of the supreme court of law and equity, judges of admiralty and an attorney-general, who shall be commissioned by the Governor, and hold their offices during good behavior." I ask gentlemen what power is intended here to be limited and checked by the words "shall hold their offices during good behavior." Not the executive, for it is well known that the Governor of that state cannot appoint even a constable. It could not be the meaning of that constitution to check his power of removal, for that of appointment is not anywhere given to him. Then these words must mean, that the legislature should not have the power of removing the judges from office as long as they behaved well. If you do not give this signification to the words, they are of no importance, and might as well have been left out of the instrument. I hope the feelings of the people of North Carolina will not be hurt, and their understandings insulted, by telling us that the meaning of the words may be satisfied by construing them to extend to a prohibition of the legislature displacing the judges, and proceeding to the election of others, without those displaced being guilty of misbehavior. If this is correct, what security, Sir, have the people then for the independence of their judges? The constitution has told them that they should be judged by men who, during the time they behaved well, should continue in office, or what is the same thing, should hold them during good behavior. But they are now informed that this was intended to operate as a check upon the legislature's displacing them by selecting others to fill their offices when they had not misbehaved, but not to prevent their passing a law repealing that act by which the appointment to office was made; or in other words, our assembly are expressly forbidden to impair the tenure by which our judges hold their offices, as long as they behave well; but they can repeal the law, and the judges are out of office, though they may be the most virtuous, upright and able men in the country, and have discharged their duties faithfully. Are the gentlemen on this floor from North Carolina prepared to give this construction to that constitution? Are they prepared to tell their constituents that the provisions of their constitution may be thus evaded, and the whole power of government, legislative, executive and judicial, be concentrated in the general assembly, and absolute despotism imposed upon them? If they are not, I conjure them to pause before they give their vote for the passage of the bill on the table. I will further observe, Mr. Chairman, that words of the same import with those I have quoted from the constitution of North Carolina, are to be found in the Virginia and South Carolina constitutions, in neither of which states hath the Governor the right of appointing judges.

In Virginia, Sir, the judges of the supreme court, in 1792, declared that the assembly of that state had not the power of imposing chancery duties on the district judge, and in delivering their opinions discanted at large on the independence of the judiciary, and said that the assembly could not annihilate the office of a judge, which was secured to him by the constitution. If this is a true exposition of the constitution of that state, I ask gentlemen by what authority they now attempt to impose a different meaning on the same words, when found in the constitution of the United States? Are we to suppose that the whole people of America were less regardful for their rights, less solicitous for independent judges, than the people of a particular state? And unless this is conceded, the doctrine of gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill must be incorrect.

But it has been said that the powers of each Congress are equal, and that a subsequent legislature can repeal the acts of a former; and as this law was passed by the last Congress, we have the same power to repeal it which they had to enact it. This objection is more plausible than solid. It is not contended by us that legislatures who are not limited in their powers, have not the same authority. The question is not what omnipotent assemblies can do, but what we can do, under a constitution defining and limiting, with accuracy, the extent and boundaries of our authority. The very section in the constitution (sect. 3, art. 1), which I have read, is a proof against the power of every Congress to repeal the acts of their predecessors. In the latter part of the 8th section it is proposed, that the judges shall receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office; and yet the salary was fixed and ascertained by a former Congress. The same observations may be made with respect to compensation for President, which can neither be decreased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected. It is not competent for this Congress to vary the compensation to him, which has been fixed by a prior legislature. It is clearly seen, upon a little investigation, that the position which gentlemen take is too extensive, and leads immediately to a destruction of the constitution. It does away all check, and makes the legislature omnipotent. It has been asked, that if a corrupt and unprincipled Congress should make an army of judges, have not a subsequent Congress the right of repealing the law establishing this monstrous judicial system? I answer, that they have not; the same mode of reasoning which attempts to prove this right from an abuse of power, will also prove that you may lessen the compensation of your judges. May not equal oppression be imposed upon the people, by giving your judges exorbitant salaries, as by increasing their numbers? May not the same corrupt and unprincipled motive which would lead men to the raising of an army of judges, lead them to squander the public money? And may they not, instead of giving their judges 2000 dollars a year, give them 200,000? And yet, Sir, if these were to take place, I know of no authority under the constitution to lessen this exorbitant compensation. The government of our country is predicated upon a reasonable confidence in those who administer our public affairs. They must have the power of acting for the public welfare, and this would never have been given them if the possible abuse of this power were a sufficient reason for withholding it.

I will take the liberty of observing further, that this part of the constitution, which forbids lessening the compensation to the judges during their continuance in office, furnishes a strong argument that it was the intention of the people to place their judges out of the control of the legislature as long as they behaved well; that they did mean to render them independent of the legislature to a certain extent, is obvious; inasmuch as they inhibit the power of reducing their salaries. For it is evident, that if they could take from them their compensation, they might drive them from office; and the consequence would have been, that our judges would have felt all the dependence which results from a consciousness that another body has the power of diminishing their comforts. I ask gentlemen if the framers of this constitution intended to give Congress the power of abolishing the office of a judge, by repealing the law which created the office, and thereby displace the judge? Where could have been the propriety of forbidding his salary to be diminished during his continuance in office?

Is it possible to suppose that they were more anxious to secure that independence which results from permanency of compensation, than that which results from permanency of the office itself? That they should have been altogether regardless of the power which Congress was to have over the office, but limit with the utmost strictness their power of diminishing the salary, when the office itself, upon which the salary depends, was to be at the mercy of Congress? I believe that such folly cannot, with justice, be attributed to these great men who gave existence to this instrument.

Again, Sir, the construction which gentlemen on the other side of the House would contend for, tends to the concentration of legislative and executive powers in the same hands. If Congress, who have the power of making laws, can also displace their judges by repealing that which creates the offices they fill, the irresistible consequence is, that whatever law is passed the judges must carry into execution, or they will be turned out of office. It is of little importance to the people of this country whether Congress sits in judgment upon their laws themselves, or whether they sit in judgment upon those who are appointed for that purpose. It amounts to the same despotism; they in fact judge the extent and obligations of their own statutes by having those in their power who are placed on the sacred seat of justice. Whatever the legislature declares to be law must be obeyed. The constitutional check which the judges were to be on the legislature is completely done away. They may pass ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, suspend the writ of habeas corpus in time of peace; and the judge who dares to question their authority is to be hurled from his seat. All the ramparts which the constitution has erected around the liberties of the people, are prostrated at one blow by the passage of this law. The monstrous and unheard of doctrine which has been lately advanced, that the judges have not the right of declaring unconstitutional laws void, will be put into practice by the adoption of this measure. New offences may be created by law. Associations and combinations may be declared treason, and the affrighted and appalled citizen may in vain seek refuge in the independence of your courts. In vain may he hold out the constitution and deny the authority of Congress to pass a law of such undefined signification, and call upon the judges to protect him; he will be told that the opinion of Congress now is, that we have no right to judge of their authority; this will be the consequence of concentrating judicial and legislative power in the same hands. It is the very definition of tyranny, and wherever you find it, the people are slaves, whether they call their government a monarchy, republic or democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I see, or think I see, in this attempt, that spirit of innovation which has prostrated before it a great part of the old world. Every institution which the wisdom and experience of ages had reared up for the benefit of man. A spirit which has rode in the whirlwind and directed the storm, to the destruction of the fairest portion of Europe; which has swept before it every vestige of law, religion, morality, and rational government; which has brought twenty millions of people at the feet of one man, and compelled them to seek refuge from their complicated miseries, in the calm of despotism. It is against the influence of this tremendous spirit, that I wish to raise my voice, and exert my powers, weak and feeble as they are. I fear, Sir, on the 7th of December, it made its appearance within these walls, clothed in a gigantic body, impatient for action. I fear it has already begun to exert its all-devouring energy. Have you a judiciary system extending over this immense country, matured by the wisdom of your ablest and best men? It must be destroyed. Have you taxes which have been laid since the commencement of the government? And is the irritation consequent upon the laying of taxes worn off? Are they paid exclusively by the wealthy and the luxurious part of the community? And are they pledged for the payment of the public debt? They must be abolished. Have you a mint establishment, which is not only essentially necessary to protect the country against the influx of base foreign metals, but is a splendid attribute of sovereignty? It must be abolished. Have you laws which require foreigners coming to your country to go through a probationary state, by which their habits, their morals and propensities may be known, before they are admitted to all the rights of native Americans? They must be repealed, and our shores crowded with the outcasts of society, lest oppressed humanity then should find no asylum on this globe!

Mr. Chairman, if the doctrine contended for by gentlemen on the other side of the House should become the settled construction of the constitution, and enlightened America acquiesce with that construction, I declare for myself, and for myself alone, I would not heave a sigh nor shed a tear over its total desolation. The wound you are about to give it will be mortal; it may languish out a miserable existence for a few years, but it will surely die. It will neither serve to protect its friends, nor defend itself from the omnipotent energies of its enemies. Better at once to bury it with all our hopes.

The First Secession Movement

The late Dr. W. R. Wood, Superintendent of the Asylum, some years ago sent me the enclosed letter, with the proceedings of the first meeting declaring secession (in imitation of the Mecklenburg Declaration) ever held. This Declaration antedated the South Carolina Declaration more than two months. This was on 14 October, 1860, and that of South Carolina was on 20 December of that year.

This is a valuable historical document, and, being from that section, I know the statements therein are entirely accurate. WALTER CLARK.

HON. WALTER CLARK,

Raleigh, N. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE:—I herewith confide to your especial care—In Memoriam of a past age and a lost cause—the Minutes of the first declaration of secession ever formulated and promulgated in the Southern States.

The history of this first declaration of secession principles have never been written, and therefore has never been generally known. Mecklenburg with her declaration of 1775 has been oft and oft recorded in letters of living light, high on the pages of fame's immortal scroll in the New World's history. Therefore, and wherefore should not this second movement in behalf of constitutional liberty and the sovereign rights of a chivalrous people, by the sages of old Halifax, in the startling era of the sixties, be handed down to our posterity in the history of American martyrs and Southern heroism.

Perhaps in the remote future, amid the changes wrought by time in the destinies of States, it may come to pass, that the actors in the opening drama of 1860, who, thus launched forth this first declaration of secession in defiance of a World in Arms, will be considered something more than irrational impulsive visionaries or impetuous fire eaters.

With sentiments of distinguished consideration and esteem, I am, Very truly your friend,

WILLIAM R. WOOD.

A CHAPTER OF HISTORY.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE FIRST SECESSION MOVEMENT AND DECLARATIONS OF THE FIRST SECESSION RESOLUTIONS EVER HELD IN THE SOUTHERN STATES, AT PALMYRA, HALIFAX COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA, OCTOBER 14TH, 1860.

Pursuant to previous notice issued for the purpose of eliciting an expression of opinion relative to the action of the people of North Carolina in the event of the certain election of a sectional President, the citizens of Halifax and adjoining counties of Edgecombe, Martin and Bertie assembled "en masse" at Palmyra on the 14th inst. The meeting was largely composed of men of character, of influence and standing in their separate communities. General David Clark, Thos. Jones, Samuel Hyman, A. P. Hyman, L. L. Savage, Henry B. Whitmore, Kenneth Thigpen, Dr. William R. Wood, W. R. Cherry and other kindred spirits were early on hand voicing the sentiments of our people in no uncertain words. Crowds of men, of all conditions and walks of life, from the great slave holders of the Roanoke Valley to the humblest, poorest man in the neighborhood, thronged the village and adjacent groves, manifesting deep and serious interest in the great momentous questions of the times. The meeting was called to order by the Hon. Kenneth Thigpen of Edgecombe. Thos. Jones, Esq., of Martin was nominated to the Chair and A. P. Hyman of Palmyra appointed Secretary.

The Chairman in a brief incisive speech pointed out the evils of the hour, and with a master's hand portrayed in gloomy colors the threatening troubles hanging like a dark funeral pall over the institutions and destinies of the Southern people. After Mr. Jones had explained the object and interest of the meeting, Gen'l David Clark of Halifax was called on to give his views of the situation. The general was peculiarly happy in the manner and delivery of his remarks, and in a spirited, stirring talk of a few moments completely captured the audience, creating quite a sensation and electrifying his hearers by exclaiming in language most prophetic: "Gentlemen, Lincoln will be elected, all you hold dear, your wives, your children, your property and your sacred honors, are at stake. The hour has struck, the enemy is upon us. The time for action, decisive action, is at hand. The powers of evil have all combined against us to rob us of our substances and dishonor us in our manhood. We must act, act in the living present with all the sublime courage of heroes and martyrs. There is nothing stands between us now and our deadliest foes. The abolitionists and disunionists of the New England States, for the Democrats have played the devil and the Whigs have gone to hell." This brought down the house and the General retired amid a storm of applause. General Clark was followed by the young, impassioned and uncompromising advocate of secession, Dr. William R. Wood of Scotland Neck, in a political argument on the right of secession, beginning with the Hartford Convention and closing in an eloquent and scathing phillipic against Northern abolitionists, and in concluding, declared it the imperative duty of North Carolina to at once withdraw from the Federal Compact and joining her Southern sisters, seek, with them an alliance, offensive and defensive with the powers of Great Britain. And if necessary to preserve and protect her people from Northern aggression and domination renew her allegiance to the British Crown. This open defiance of Northern supremacy again brought down the house, but also brought our Chairman, Mr. Jones, to the floor. Requesting the venerable Samuel Hyman to take the chair, Mr. Jones made a ringing speech against an alliance with England, advocating with force and effect his "pet idea," an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Emperor of France. The debate waxed fast and furious for a few moments on these two propositions of Dr. Wood and Mr. Jones, and for awhile considerable merriment and confusion ensued, but debate was cut short and order restored by the ever ready, gallant Kenneth Thigpen, who in a few stirring, startling words impressed the importance of the occasion upon the convention and demanded the appointment of a committee to formulate a platform of resolutions giving emphatic expression to the views of the people. Upon that committee, the following gentlemen were appointed by the Chair:

Hon. Kenneth Thigpen,
Gen'l. David Clark,
Thos. Jones, Esq.,
Dr. William R. Wood,
Lem. L. Savage, Esq.

As a guest of Mr. Jones, Mr. Whitmel Kearney of Warren, who was present and whose people were known to be in sympathy with the movement, was by unanimous consent added to the committee. These gentlemen retired, and after considerable time and much consultation, reappeared and announced the following preamble and resolutions:

1st. Whereas, The people of the Northern section of our common country are forcing through the legislatures of their several States, with all the elements of implacable hatred, so called personal liberty bills, abrogating in its entirety, the fugitive slave laws, subverting the constitution of our fathers, and openly threatening the most sacred interests and institutions of the Southern States by declaring that instrument which binds this Union together as coequal sovereigns a covenant with death and a league with hell.

And, Whereas, The Republican party has proclaimed itself a sectional party, pledged to wage relentless war against the institutions of the South:

Therefore, Resolved, That whereas the Republican States of New England were the first to proclaim the right of secession, we will profit by their example, and their language of the Hartford Convention. Declare, That "when emergencies occur which are either beyond the reach of the Judicial tribunals, or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms, States which have no common umpire, must be their own judges and execute their own decisions."

Resolved, 2nd. That henceforth we renounce all allegiance to the United States Government, and appeal to our Legislature to call a convention for the purpose of withdrawing North Carolina from the Federal Compact and negctiating with other Southern States in forming alliances offensive and defensive with the Emperor Napoleon the III. of France.

Before a vote was taken on the committee's report, Dr. Wood, though a member of the committee, appealed to the convention to vote down Mr. Jones' French resolutions, and offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That as North Carolinians, we disown, disavow and utterly repudiate all allegiance to the so called Federal Government, and demand the unconditional withdrawal of North Carolina from the Federal Compact, and for the better preservation of her sovereignty as a free and independent State, unite with her Southern sister States in forming an alliance offensive and defensive with the powers of Great Britain, and if necessary to protect her people from Northern aggression and domination, renew her allegiance to the British Crown.

After considerable debate between the parties advocating the French and English propositions, Dr. Wood's resolution was voted down. The preamble and resolutions as they came from the committee were unanimously adopted and the convention adjourned.

My Dear Doctor:—The above is but a rough sketch in pencil of our great Secession Convention in 1860. Try and copy them off as best you can and preserve it in memory of old friends and a lost cause. Your friend, Palmyra, A. D. 1866. A. P. Hyman.

The above is a truthful transcription of the rough notes referred to by my late father, A. P. Hyman, Secretary of the meeting at the time, as copied out in full by the undersigned at the request of Dr. Wood. A. P. Hyman, Jr.

John Washington Bennett, Famous North Carolinian

By Gen. W. A. Smith.

(Written by request of the Anson County Daughters of the Confederacy.)

One William Bennett many long years ago married a Miss Huckston and begat William Bennett, Jr.; William Bennett, Jr., married Susanna Dunn, thus uniting the famous Dunn family with the probably more famous Bennett family. William Bennett's father was a captain in the Revolution and his great-uncle was a general, commanding a division in Cromwell's world renowned Ironsides. Isaac Dunn, who was a younger son, and brother to Sir Daniel Dunn, married Miss Mary Sheffield and begat Susanna Dunn, who was the only fruit of this marriage. There was born to William Bennett, Jr., and Susanna Dunn, Lemuel Dunn Bennett, who married Jane Little, daughter of William Little of Marlsgate, England. To L. D. Bennett and Jane Little was born the subject of this sketch—John Washington Bennett.

Descended from a long line of illustrious ancestry on both sides, he inherited extraordinary capacity—a sound mind in a sound body. In the old field schools, in the academy, in the university, his character developed and was marked by mental ability and moral courage of a supreme order and type.

When a youth in his teens his sturdy manhood sought outlet in the existing development of the States on the banks of the Mississippi. While with his cousin, Charles Bennett, he was stricken with that fell disease, typhoid fever. For weeks he daily grew worse till his life was despaired of and his death confidently expected. Treatment of that day denied the patient water or other cooling drink. He lay for days in weltering heat; his breath hot, his tongue swollen; aye! cracked and parched with the scorching fever. No soothing touch of a dear woman's hand was laid on his burning brow. His bachelor cousin Charles was his only companion and nurse. He begged so piteously and so continuously for water that, manlike, his cousin Charles' patience became exhausted. He brought a bucket of fresh water from the cistern, set it near the bedside and said, "Drink, drink ye all you want, and—and die." Believing the water would kill him, he would not hand it and become his murderer.

By a supreme effort he succeeded in getting the gourd to his mouth and quaffed it off. The cold water revived his strength. Again and again he drank freely of the elixir of life. His overloaded stomach rejected the excessive potations, which had fortunately absorbed, in some measure, the heat of his feverish body. From that moment a turn in the tide set in and he rapidly convalesced to normal health. He returned to his native heath, determined to complete his education and went to the University of Virginia. After graduating, he chose the profession of medicine.

With his sheepskin properly signed by the president and other professors of the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, attesting his proficient qualifications in the science of medicine, he returned to Anson County and located in the new and thriving village of Carolina Female College, since known as Ansonville. Courteous manners, kindly interest, friendly deeds, assiduous application, conjoined with natural ability, soon won him a large, lucrative patronage.

His success was assured and he took unto himself a helpmate, marrying the beautiful, stately, and attractive Miss Rosa Boggan, of the city of Wadesboro, his social equal. It is usually conducive to happiness—mating in the same social circle. Only a few short, fleeting, happy months were granted to them when she winged her flight to Elysian fields.

Soon afterwards the tocsin of war sounded throughout the land and we find our doctor of medicine marching in the ranks, keeping step to the quivering throbbings of the drum and the martial symphonies of the fife.

On arrival of his company in Richmond his fame as a physician had preceded him—he was taken from the ranks, raised to the rank of captain and appointed assistant surgeon of Chimborazo Hospital. Here his skill as a physician had ample opportunity to develop and display the strong mental capacity and resourceful man behind the energetic surgeon. We have no access to the records, if in existence, and can not know the many successful operations performed upon the hundreds or thousands of wounded carried to the hospital. His retiring disposition shrank from notoriety, and he told not even to his most intimate friends the many serious surgical operations performed. We do know his fame as a surgeon and physician increased with the months of service and experience, because when it became necessary for the government of the Confederacy to establish another hospital in the city of Richmond, known as the Soldiers' Home, Dr. John W. Bennett was selected from the many aspirants, and was appointed chief surgeon with the rank of major in the Confederate army. This position he worthily filled till after Appomattox, remaining with commendable faithfulness at his post until the last patient was discharged.

Returning to his native heath, whose sacred soil had been trod by the vandal hordes of Sherman's army—home laid waste and devastated by fire and sword—his courage equaled the calamity and with renewed energy he sought to repair his fallen fortunes.

Zeal, guided by wisdom and experience, soon made him the loved physician of the section, success crowned his efforts without oppressing the poor (and we were all poor), and all never failing to find in him a man of warm sympathetic heart, ever ready to respond to their call for relief. He gave to every patient the needed attention and did not neglect the insignificant and destitute. His one object in life was to relieve suffering humanity and his zest equaled his physical endurance.

To the mind of the writer one characteristic of his greatness was displayed and exemplified by his disbelief in much dosing. I have heard him say that to exacting patients he had often prescribed and administered bread pills. It was his firm conviction, exemplified in his practice, to sustain the physical being till nature could rectify the malady and restore the body to its normal condition. One day Doctor Bennett and the writer were driving along the lane some three hundred yards north of Mr. Perde Richardson's residence. At that time the old rail fence was the only protection of cultivated fields from stock that ran at large. The better the fence the better the farmer, and planters vied one with another in having the best fence. This fence was laid with rails ten feet long, zigzag like the track made by a crawling snake, hence the name "snake fence."

The rails laid on the ground, or worm as it was called, were placed with great care and precision, sighted by stakes, that each corner should be perfectly in line and straight as the famous "bee line." After the worm was laid, then one rail was placed exactly over another to the number of ten. At the corners, where the rails locked, were planted in the ground two rails, one on either side of the fence, leaning against the corners, acting as a brace to the fence. These two rails formed a lock above the panel and another rail was laid in the locks of each panel—making a very high, strong and substantial fence, proof against raging winds and mean stock —as General Atlas Dargan used to say, "Horse high, pig tight, and bull strong." Such a fence bordered either side of the road—usually termed a lane. Riding along this lane, as above stated, Doctor Bennett became reminiscent, and related the following incident; as near as possible, I quote his own words:

"Riding along here one dark night on a professional call, I heard horsemen approaching at a rapid, flying gait. Fearing danger, I reined my horse to one side near the fence to escape being run over. To my astonishment I saw neither horses nor horsemen, but the sound of flying feet of race horses cleaving the wind passed obliquely across the road, over the fence and off through the field. Pondering upon this strange occurrence as I rode along, about one hundred yards I overtook Aunt Dicey, an old darky belonging to Mr. Perde Richardson. I asked her if she met or saw any men on horses riding rapidly. She replied: 'Oh, Marse John, dat's dem old race horses; dey rides ever now and den of er night.'

"On investigating the matter I learned that in the Revolutionary days there was a straight level stretch of road here running obliquely across the present road which was used as a race track, and that in one of the races a man was killed."

Doctor Bennett, relating the above, looked straight to the front. He did not even smile and spoke the words of truth and soberness.

Experiencing the desolateness of the empty house and fireless hearth, he again sought and obtained the great boon of the love of another fair daughter of one of Anson's nobility and wedded the lovely maid, Mary Richardson. He bought the commodious residence of the LeGrands, about two miles from Wadesboro, at the beginning of what was then known as Longtown, embracing a section of highway leading from Wadesboro to Cheraw. Said section was decked at convenient, neighborly intervals with the residences of the Marshalls, the Smiths, the Richardsons, the Littles, and the Bennetts. Here allow a digression for a moment to say the name "Longtown" was evidently imported from England, as there is still a similar section so designated, lying in Cumberland County, near the border of Scotland, contiguous to the original and famous "Gretna Green" and adjacent to Marlsgate, the ancient seat of the Little family.

Doctor Bennett's practice was extensive, embracing not only the section of country adjoining, but Wadesboro, Lilesville and adjacent sections. Because of the exposure of his family in the country to the lawless miscreants of Reconstruction days and afterwards, during his necessary absence in pursuit of his profession, he sold his elegant home and purchased in the limits of the corporation of the town of Wadesboro.

Born among rugged hills, his cradle rocked amid the everlasting foundations of granite cliffs overhanging Jones Creek, his lullabies the singing waters, made him a very child of Nature. Roaming the hills, gun in hand, and resting his weary head on the rocks for a pillow, no wonder he took cognizance of the flora and herbs of health-restoring qualities and turned his attentive genius to the art of healing—the greatest boon of suffering humanity.

A living and live member of the Methodist Church, he died May 6, 1899, in the odor of sanctity, leaving a priceless heritage of a noble life to his wife, two sons and two daughters, and—and to a host of friends. Another brave soldier answered to the last roll call when the Master ordered the angel to beat taps to the loyal soul of John Washington Bennett—chief surgeon of the Confederate Hospital, "The Soldiers' Home."

The Continental Line of North Carolina

By Frank Nash.

To pause, even for a moment, in the midst of the turmoil of a world, to consider the part that the Continental Line of North Carolina took in the Revolutionary War, seems, at first blush, puerile. When the philosophical historian, however, comes later to trace through the distant past the causes of the Great War, he will find that the "embattled farmers" of 1776 were inspired by the same idealism that the Allies are now; that the Revolutionary War had the same spiritual import as has the Great War. He will find that the material outcome of that war is small, very small, when compared with its moral effect upon the world at large; that a victorious peace was, in itself, insignificant, as compared with the spiritual conquest of our ally, France, and of our foe, Britain. Had it not been for this conquest the present war would have been a mere sordid struggle for more territory and more power, with America on one side, an interested observer, but not an active participant. As it is she is standing hand in hand and soul to soul with these great democracies, feeling in the depths of her heart that the struggle of 1776 has been renewed, only its theater is the world, and not a small section of a continent.

If the Revolutionary War was waged in defense of the liberties of Americans, much more is this; if it was a protest against autocracy, much more is this; if it was a defense of democracy, much more is this. The Great War is indeed a life and death struggle between the two antagonistic world political principles, autocracy and democracy, and if the former conquers, then all the blood that our ancestors shed, all the treasure they expended, was shed in vain, were expended in vain.

It is fortunate that we have as president at this time of stress a great historian, as well as a great statesman. He knows, none better, how terribly destructive to life and property has been the lack of organization in all our wars, from the Revolution to that with Spain. So he put in action a thousand wonderful agencies which are welding the 110,000,000 people of this country into an army inspired by one spirit and moving to one end. He knew how much the great souled Washington was harrassed by the folly and dilatoriness of the Continental Congress in raising an army for the defense of their liberties; he knew the disgraceful inefficiency of the militia in the War of 1812, and the equally disgraceful insubordination of the volunteers in the War with Mexico; he knew the unpreparedness of both sides in the War Between the States, as marked also in the Spanish-American War; so he gave us the draft, the wisest, fairest, and most equal way of raising an army for the defense of democracy.

There is little exaggeration in Senator Chamberlain's declaration: "I have sometimes wondered how that distinguished commander of the American forces (Washington), with his splendid aide, Alexander Hamilton, ever had time to organize an army, because they devoted so much of their time to appeals to the Continental Congress and to the States to assist them in organizing an army that might be successful in the accomplishment of victory."

Out of those appeals, however, came the Continental Line. Congress at first refused to make the enlistment longer than for one year. "It is not easy," said Judge Marshall, in his Life of Washington, "to account for this fatal error. Some jealousy of a permanent army was, probably, intermingled with the hope that the war would not be of long duration, and with the fear that much difficulty would be experienced in prevailing on men to enter into engagements of unlimited extent." It took the Long Island disaster, August 27, 1776, as well as much pleading from Washington, to arouse Congress to action. He thus writes to them after that disaster:

"Our situation is truly distressing. The check our detachment sustained on the 27th ultimo has dispirited too great a proportion of our troops, and filled their minds with apprehension and despair. The militia, instead of calling forth their utmost efforts to a brave and manly opposition, in order to repair our losses, are dismayed, intractable and impatient to return. Great numbers of them have gone off, in some instances almost by whole regiments, in many by half ones and by companies at a time. This circumstance of itself, independent of others, when fronted by a well appointed enemy, superior in number to our whole collected force, would be sufficiently disagreeable; but when it is added that their example has infected another part of the army; that their want of discipline and refusal of almost every kind of restraint and government, have rendered a like conduct but too common in the whole, and have produced an entire disregard of that order and subordination necessary for the well doing of an army, our condition is still more alarming, and with the deepest concern I am obliged to confess my want of confidence in the generality of the troops. All these circumstances fully confirm the opinion I ever entertained, and which I, more than once in my letters, took the liberty of mentioning to Congress: that no dependence could be put in a militia, or other troops than those enlisted and embodied for a longer period than our regulations have heretofore prescribed. I am persuaded, and am as fully convinced as of any one fact that has happened, that our liberties must, of necessity, be greatly hazarded, if not entirely lost, if their defense be left to any but a permanent army."

Immediately after the receipt of this letter, September, 1776, Congress proposed to the various States a permanent army to be enlisted for the war, and to be composed of eighty-eight battalions. These were to be raised by the various States in proportion to their ability. The share of North Carolina was nine battalions. A bounty of twenty dollars was allowed to each recruit, and portions of vacant lands were allotted to each soldier, from 500 acres to a colonel down to 100 acres for each noncommissioned officer and private.

The Hillsboro Congress of August-September, 1775, acting under the one-year plan of the Continental Congress, had already provided for two regiments of five hundred men each, and had elected the officers as follows:

FIRST REGIMENT.

Colonel—James Moore.
Lieutenant Colonel—Francis Nash.
Major—Thomas Clark.
Adjutant—Wm. Williams.
Captains—Wm. Davis, Thos. Allon, Alfred Moore, Caleb Grainger, Wm. Pickett, Robert Rowan, John Walker, Henry Dickson, George Davidson, William Green.
Lieutenants—John Lillington, Joshua Bowman, Lawrence Thompson, Thomas Hogg, William Berryhill, Hector McNeill, Absolum Tatum, Hezekiah Rice, William Brandon, William Hill.
Ensigns—Neill McAlister, Maurice Moore, Jr., John Taylor, Howell Tatum, James Childs, Henry Neill, Berryman Turner, George Graham, Robert Rolston, Henry Pope.
Surgeon—Dr. Isaac Guion.

SECOND REGIMENT.

Colonel—Robert Howe.
Lieutenant Colonel—Alexander Martin.
Major—John Patten.
Adjutant and First Captain—John White.
Captains—James Blount, Michael Payne, Simon Bright, Jno. Armstrong, H. I. Toole, Hardy Murfree, Chas. Crawford, Nathaniel Keais, John Walker.
Lieutenants—John Grainger, Clement Hall, William Fenner, Benjamin Williams, Robert Smith, Edward Vail, Jr., John Williams, John Heritage, Joseph Tate, James Gee.
Ensigns—Henry Vipon, Whitmell Pugh, John Oliver, Philip Low, James Cook, John Woodhouse, William Gardner, William Caswell, Benjamin Cleveland, Joseph Clinch.
Surgeon—Dr. William Pasteur.

The captains were to be commissioned as soon as their various companies were filled up by recruits, thus making rank a reward to the diligent. The Halifax Congress, in April, 1776, added four additional regiments to the Continental Line, and that of November, 1776, three, thus making the quota of nine battalions asked of the State. These battalions were to consist of eight companies, and each company of 76, rank and file. The Continental Congress later refused to receive any battalion containing less than 300 file into the service. A tenth battalion, commanded by Col. Abraham Shepperd, was added to the Continental Line in 1777. It did not join Washington until the Spring of 1778.

Speaking generally, the Continental troops of North Carolina never took part in a battle in which they did not fight well and bravely, but none of the battalions were full when they were engaged in active service. The difficulty of enlisting men for a long term, when they could satisfy their conscience by a three months' service with the militia, particularly when the enlistment for a long term would be followed by marches, perhaps to a distant State, the smallness of the bounty provided by the State of North Carolina for such enlistments, as compared with those of neighboring States, and the remissness of both the Confederacy and the State to provide them with adequate equipment and an adequate commissary, all tended to retard enlistments in the first instance, while numerous desertions among the men depleted the ranks after enlistments had been made. There were four regiments in Charleston in 1776, and it is probable that there were not more than 600 effective soldiers. Not more than 800 marched north with General Nash in 1777, to Brandywine and Germantown. We know that on November 10, 1777, the brigade contained only 520 effectives, 868 in all. (11 S. R., page 676.) And this notwithstanding the fact that Col. John Williams had joined with the 7th, 8th, and 9th battalions. These latter battalions, however, had only fragments of their quotas. Indeed the most striking, and at the same time depressing, fact in the history of the regular troops of North Carolina in the Revolution is the difficulty those in authority had in enlisting a proper number of men and in keeping them in the ranks after they were enlisted. It is true 5,454 names appear upon the roster (16 S. R., pages 1002 et seq.), but this number includes all who had died, been captured, discharged, omitted, or deserted; and of the latter there was considerably over ten per cent of the whole number.

The first actual service of these troops was at Charleston, South Carolina. An account of this I take from Ashe's History of North Carolina, pages 536-9:

"On the departure of the fleet (British) from the Cape Fear, Lee hastened to Charleston, accompanied by Howe, where he arrived early in June (1776). Moore remained at Wilmington, but two Continental regiments under Nash and Martin reached Charleston on June 11th, followed later by the Virginia Regiment and the Third and Fourth Continentals, not then needed at Cape Fear. A rifle regiment raised in the west likewise repaired to Charleston. Felix Wagner, afterwards long a member of congress from the Buncombe district, says in his Autobiography: 'I was appointed lieutenant in Captain Richardson's company in the rifle regiment. I returned to Watauga and recruited my full proportion of men and marched them to Charleston in May, 1776, joined the regiment and was stationed on James Island.'

"When the fleet dropped anchor off the bar the Charlestonians barricaded their streets and prepared to defend the wharves of their city, and soon troops were stationed on the outlying islands inclosing the harbor. Colonel Moultrie began working night and day constructing a fort on the end of Sullivan's Island by bolting palmetto logs together for walls, with sixteen feet of sand between them. Week after week passed and no attack was made, so that toward the end of June the front of his fort was well finished and thirty odd guns were mounted in it. But powder was scarce, and there were hardly twenty-five rounds of ammunition for the guns. On the northeast of that island lay Long Island, a naked sand bank, and there Clinton landed more than three thousand troops, intending to cross the narrow intervening waters and thus gain possession of Sullivan's Island. To resist his advance Colonel Thompson of South Carolina was stationed at that end of Sullivan's Island with three hundred of his own riflemen, two hundred of Clark's North Carolina regiment, two hundred more South Carolinians under Horry, and with some light pieces on his flank; while Nash, for whom Lee had conceived a high opinion, was placed to defend the rear of the fort, which was unfinished and a post of great consequence.

"After much fortunate delay, in the early morning of June 28th the fleet approached the fort and the battle began. The British brought into action ten times the number of guns that Moultrie could use, but made no impression on the palmetto fort. A flag of blue with a white crescent emblazoned with the word 'Liberty' proudly floated over the rampart. In the torrent of balls the staff that bore it was severed, but as it fell Sergeant Jasper heroically seized the standard and raised it again on the bastion next to the enemy. The attempt to pass from Long Island was no more successful than the attack on the water. The brave Americans drove the infantry back on two occasions, and the assault both on land and sea was a signal failure. The slow and skillful fire of Moultrie drove off the fleet and destroyed several frigates, the Bristol losing 40 men killed and 71 wounded, and the Experiment, 23 killed and 56 wounded; while the American loss, after ten hours of incessant conflict, was but 11 killed and 26 wounded. Repulsed, defeated, the army reëmbarked on the vessels and the contest was over."

A fleet under Sir Peter Parker had recently come out of England with fresh troops, commanded by the Earl of Cornwallis. It was joined by transports and men of war, bearing a force under Sir Henry Clinton, and a combined attack was made, by sea and land, upon the fort on Sullivan's Island, but the attack was a complete failure, the fort sinking two of the enemy's vessels, one, Sir Peter's own flag ship. General Charles Lee was in command of the patriot army. In his official report he said: "I know not which corps I have the greatest reason to be pleased with; Muhlenberg's Virginians or the North Carolina troops; they were both equally alert, zealous, and spirited. . . . Upon the whole the South and North Carolina troops and the Virginia rifle battalion we have here are admirable soldiers." This was a very handsome compliment to raw troops from one who was himself a trained and experienced soldier.

The Third Regiment and some companies of the First and Second remained in South Carolina, under the command of General Robert Howe, for the remainder of the year 1776, while the other regiments were with General James Moore in North Carolina. They were distributed at different points in the eastern part of the State, while a small detachment of the Third was at Salisbury with Colonel Alexander Martin. In March, 1776, Colonel James Moore of the First Regiment was promoted to be Brigadier, and on April 10, 1776, Francis Nash was made Colonel of that regiment, and still later, February 5, 1777, he, also, was made a brigadier-general, and was ordered to the western part of the State to expedite the recruiting service. In March, however, he was ordered to join

General Moore, and with him to proceed north with all the Continental troops that could be collected. General Moore died about the middle of April. In a sketch of his life in the Biog. His. of N. C., vol. 2, page 301, it is said: "General Moore was a man of delicate organization and frail constitution, in striking contrast with his heroic soul and fine intellectual capacity. The exposure to which he was subjected that summer and fall (1776) on the malarious coast of South Carolina proved fatal to him. His health gave way, and in January, 1777, he returned to the Cape Fear, and died on the 15th of that month, lamented by all the patriots of North Carolina. It is related that he and his brother, Judge Maurice Moore, expired in the same house on the same day and were buried together. Of General Moore it has been said that he was the most masterful military man furnished by North Carolina in the War of Independence, and probably he had no superior in military genius on the continent."

It is well to notice that in several places in this volume of the Biographical History it is stated that General Moore died on January 15th. This, of course, is wrong. He died, as stated above, about the middle of April, 1777. (See 11 S. R., pages 411, 454, and 456.)

On the 20th of April General Nash set out from New Bern to take command of the brigade. From various causes the march of the troops north was delayed, and being further delayed by inoculation for smallpox at their camp at Georgetown, they did not reach Philadelphia until the 1st of July. Hugh McDonald, in his journal (11 S. R., pages 828 et seq.) gives such an interesting account of the peregrinations of the brigade and of his own adventures as a private in the Sixth Regiment of the Continental Line that I transcribe a large part of it. He was himself a Scotch Highlander and had fought at Moore's Creek.

"Notwithstanding this scouring (at Moore's Creek) and the just contempt of our fellow citizens, we remained in heart as much Tories as ever. This expedition took place in the mouth of February, 1776, from which we returned and began to prepare our fences for a crop the ensuing summer. About the first of June a report was circulated that a company of light horse were coming into the settlement; and as a guilty conscience needs no accuser, every one thought they were after him. The report was that Colonel Alston had sent out four or five men to cite us all to muster at Henry Eagle's on Bear Creek; upon which our poor deluded people took refuge in the swamps. On a certain day, when we were plowing in the field, news came to my father that the light horse were in the settlement and a request that he would conceal himself. He went to the house of his brother-in-law to give him notice, and ordered me to take the horse out of the plow, turn him loose and follow him as fast as I could. I went to the horse, but never having ploughed any in my life, I was trying how I could plow, when five men on horseback appeared at the fence, one of whom, Daniel Buie, knew me and asked me what I was doing here. I answered that my father lived here; and he said he was not aware of that. 'Come,' he says, 'you must go with us to pilot us through the settlement; for we have a boy here with us who has come far enough. He is six miles from home and is tired enough.' His name was Thomas Graham, and he lived near the head of McLennon's Creek. I told Mr. Buie that I dare not go, for, if I did, my father would kill me. He then alighted from his horse and walked into the field, ungeared the horse and took him outside the fence. He then put up the fence again; and, leading me by the hand, put me on behind one of the company, whose name was Gaster, and discharged the other boy. We then went to Daniel Shaw's, thence to John Morrison's (shoemaker), thence to Alexander McLeod's, father of merchant John McLeod, who died in Fayetteville, thence to Alexander Shaw's (blacksmith), thence to old Hugh McSwan's, who gave a half crown for a small gourd when we landed in America. Here I was ordered to go home, but I refused and went with them to the muster at Eagle's. Next day Colonel Philip Alston appeared at the muster, when these men told him that they had taken a boy to pilot them a little way through the settlement and that they could not get clear of him. The Colonel personally insisted on my going back to my father, but I told them I would not, for I had told them the consequence of my going with them before they took me. Seeing he could not prevail with me, he got a man by the name of Daniel McQueen, a noted bard, to take me home to my father, but I told him that I was determined to hang to them. Colonel Alston then took me with him and treated me kindly. Mrs. Alston desired me to go to school with her children until she could send my father word to come after me, and she would make peace between us; but her friendly offers were also rejected.

"On the following Tuesday I went with the same company of horsemen to Fayetteville (Cross Creek), where I met a gentleman by the name of Daniel Porterfield, a lieutenant in Captain Arthur Council's company, who asked me if I did not wish to enlist. I told him, not with him; but I wanted to see a Mr. Hilton who, I understood, was in the army, and wherever he was, I wished to be. He told me that he and Hilton were of one company, and if Hilton did not tell me so, he would take back the money and let me go with Hilton. I then took the money and was received into the service of the United States June 10, 1776, and in the fourteenth year of my age.

"After my enlistment we continued in Cross Creek until the middle of July, when we went on board of Mrs. Blanctret's boat and floated down to Wilmington, where the brigade was made up, which was commanded by General Frank Nash, and consisted of six regiments. Of the first regiment, Thomas Clarke was Colonel and John Mebane, Lieutenant Colonel; of the second, Alexander Martin, from Hillsboro, was Colonel and John Patton, Lieutenant Colonel: of the third, Jethro Sumner was Colonel and William Davidson, Lieutenant Colonel; of the fourth, Thomas Polk was Colonel and J. Paxton, Lieutenant Colonel; of the fifth, _____ Buncombe was Colonel and _____ Eden, Lieutenant Colonel; of the 6th, Lillington had the command, but being unable from old age to go on parade, when the regiment was made up at Wilmington, he was forced to resign, and Lieutenant Colonel Lamb of Edenton took command of the regiment. Our major died at Wilmington, and Captain Arch'd Lyttle, from Hillsboro, who had been educated for a preacher of the gospel, was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. Captain Griffin (sic) McRee, of Elizabeth Town, was appointed Major, and of this regiment (6th) I was a private soldier.

"Not more than three weeks after the brigade was embodied, my Captain, Arthur Councill, a young man who had been raised near Cross Creek, and whose father's house is yet known by the name of Councill Hall, died. This young gentleman was distinguished in the regiment for modesty, gentility and morality. Shortly after the death of Councill, his first lieutenant, who was known by the name of Philadelphia Thomas White, became our captain, and he was as immoral as Councill was moral. As sickness was prevailing in the regiment, we moved out of town about eight miles to a place called Jumping Gully, where we encamped until about the middle of October and were drilled twice a day. In this camp I was taken sick, and continued ignorant of everything that passed for five weeks. One evening, the brigade being on parade, I felt a great desire for home, and thought I saw everything at my father's house before my eyes. I got out of my tent and went away some distance to a running branch. The water, from falling over a large poplar root, had made a deep hole below, and, getting into the hole, I laid my head on the root, which I believe was the sweetest bed I ever lay in. The water was so cool to my parched body that I lay there until ten o'clock the next day before they found me, George Dudley, Sergeant of my company, having crossed within two feet of my head without seeing me. William Carrol, who was in company with Dudley, discovered me and exclaimed, 'By ------, here he is, turned to be an otter. He is under the water.' Dudley, having passed me, turned back, took me out of the water and carried me to camp. When the doctor came to see me, he said that the water had cooled my fever and that I would recover, though he had given me out before. I did recover and recruited very fast every day after my immersion. . . .

"I shall now give my readers some account of the Captains of my regiment, which was the 6th; but I shall omit the subaltern officers' list; in attempting to recall so many names and characters, I should make a mistake, which I do not wish to do. When the brigade was made up each regiment consisted of eight captains, and of the 6th regiment Arch'd Lyttle was first captain, and Griffin McRee, second, who had very undeservedly enlisted most of his men for six months and returned them for three years, or during the war. This deception on the part of Captain McRee, occasioned many desertions in his company, when six months, the term of their enlistment, had expired. Captain Lyttle was from Orange, Captain McRee, from Bladen. The 3d Captain was George Doherty, who lived on the Northeast River, in Hanover County, and about 25 miles above Wilmington. He was a full-blooded Irishman, about seventy-five years of age, much of a gentleman and a brave soldier. The fourth captain was Philip Taylor, from Orange, a raw Buckskin, destitute of grace, mercy or knowledge as to that which is spiritual, and filled with pride and arrogance. The fifth was Tilman Dickson, from Edgecombe, a dirty Buckskin, who would rather sit on his hams all day and play cards with his meanest private soldier, in his homespun dress, than wash and uniform himself and keep company with his fellow officers as a captain ought to do. The sixth captain was Jemimah Pigue (?) from Onslow, who was a smart officer, a middle-aged man, and a guardian of his soldiers. The seventh captain was Daniel Williams from Duplin, a Buckskin, a gentleman and the friend and protector of his soldiers. The eighth was Benjamin Sharp, who was from Halifax county, and was a very smart officer.

"When the brigade embodied at Wilmington, it consisted of nine thousand and four hundred, rank and file (?, probably 940); twelve colonels, including lieutenant colonels, six majors, forty-eight captains, ninety-six lieutenants, forty-eight ensigns; two drummers and two fifers to every captain's company; one hundred and eighty-two sergeants; eight quartermaster sergeants and sergeants major to each regiment; one drum major, who was an old gentleman from Elizabeth, named Alexander Harvey; one fife major, an Englishman, by the name of Robert Williams, a master of all kinds of music and genteelly bred, who had been transported from England before the war for cursing the royal family; eight doctors, eight adjutants and one Brigade Major, a hatter from Hillsboro, besides sutlers and paymasters.

"On the 1st day of November (1776) we received orders to march to the North and join the grand camp, commanded by Washington. About the 15th of November we marched from Wilmington, under the command of General Frank Nash, and proceeded to the Roanoke River and encamped about a mile and a half from the town of Halifax, in Col. Long's old fields, who was Commissary General of the North Carolina troops. There we remained about three weeks, when we received orders to turn back and go meet the British at Augustine and prevent them from getting into the state of Georgia, and proceeded by way of Wilmington. On our march we lay on the south side of Contentny Creek, where there were living an old man and woman who had a number of geese about the house; and next morning about twenty of their geese were missing. They came to the encampment inquiring about them; but getting no information among the tents, they went to the General, who said he could do nothing unless they produced the guilty. On his giving them ten dollars, however, they went away satisfied; and I am very sure that I got some of them to eat. . . . The General, after paying them ten dollars, gave the men strict orders to be honest or he would punish the least offense of that kind with severity.

"We proceeded thence to Wilmington where we stayed two days, and thence by Lockwood's Folly to Georgetown. When we got to the Boundary House we encamped for a short time to rest, and Col. Alston, a wealthy gentleman of the neighborhood, came to see General Nash, and told him he could show him a better camping ground, which was an elevated neck of lands covered with hickory and other good fire wood. The trees were covered with long moss from the top to the ground; and of this we made excellent beds. There we stayed about a month waiting for further orders, where we cut and cleared about one hundred acres of land. During our continuance here, those who had been enlisted by our Major McRee and returned during the war, applied to their captain for their discharge; but he was not aware that any in the camp had been enlisted for six months. They then applied to their old captain, who had been promoted to the rank of major, but he told them in reply to their just request, that he would have them put under guard and punished according to martial law. This rebuff they were forced to bear and remain in silence; but concerted a plan for their own relief; for in the morning it was found that nine had deserted, some of whom were never taken, notwithstanding the claims resting upon them. . . .

"From this pleasant place we marched for Charleston, S. C., and crossed the Pee Dee at a place called Winyaw, about half way between Georgetown and the inlet. Thence to Charleston, and there we had orders not to go any further towards Augustine. We then marched back across Cooper River to Hadrell's Point, opposite to Fort Sullivan, where we lay the remaining part of the winter and spring until March, 1777, and we were fed on fresh pork and rice as our constant diet. About the 15th of March, we received orders to march to North and join Washington's grand army. We marched to Wilmington, N. C., and thence to Halifax, where we crossed the Roanoke River. After leaving the ferry and marching up the river about two miles, we came to a fishery, and the commanding officer having desired leave for his men to draw the seine, which was readily granted, by drawing it once, we drew so many that you would hardly miss from the pile what we took for our breakfast. We marched on and crossed the Meherrin at Hickes' Ford. . . .

"As we passed through the State of Virginia, we could scarcely march two miles at a time without being stopped by gentlemen and ladies who were coming to the road purposely to see us. We stopped two days at Williamsburg and rested. We then marched on and crossed the James River at the town of Richmond, where there were fishers; and having gotten leave there also to draw the seine, every man took as many fish as he wanted. While passing through the town a shoemaker stood in his door and cried, 'Hurrah for King George,' of which no one took any notice; but after halting in a wood, a little distance beyond, where we cooked and ate our fish, the shoemaker came to us and began again to hurrah for King George. When the General and his aids mounted and started, he still followed them, hurrahing for King George. Upon which the General ordered him to be taken back to the river and ducked. We brought a long rope, which we tied around his middle and sesawed him backwards and forwards until we had him nearly drowned, but every time he got his head above water he would cry for King George. The General having then ordered him to be tarred and feathered, a feather bed was taken from his own house, where were his wife and four likely daughters crying and beseeching their father to hold his tongue, but still he would not. We tore the bed open and knocked the top out of a barrel of tar, into which we plunged him headlong. He was then drawn out by the heels and rolled in the feathers until he was a sight, but still he would hurrah for King George. The General now ordered him to be drummed out of the west end of the town, and told him expressly that if he plagued him any more in that way, he would have him shot. So we saw no more of the shoemaker.

"We then marched on until we came to the Potomac River; but early in the morning we were halted and all the doctors called upon to inoculate the men with small pox, which took them until two o'clock. We then crossed the river at Georgetown, about eight miles above Alexandria, near the place where Washington City now stands. There we got houses and stayed until we were well of the small pox. I having had the pox before, attended on the officers of my company until they got well, but what is very strange, in the whole Brigade there was not one man lost by pox, except one by the name of Griffin, who after he had got able to go about, I thought he was well, imprudently went to swim in the Potomac, and next morning was found dead. About the last of June we left Georgetown for Philadelphia."

I have given this long extract from Hugh McDonald's Journal because it is an interesting account of these events by an intelligent participator in them. It has to some degree the faults of all such narratives, when reduced to writing years after the events have happened: it has a few mistakes of names and of chronology. Yet after all, when compared with the records, it has very few, and the story, with its human interest, brings graphically before us the scenes through which he was passing.

The brigade arrived at Philadelphia on July 1st. They then moved on to Trenton, where they were stopped by Washington until the 26th, when they were ordered back to Philadelphia. Before they reached Philadelphia the order was countermanded. Uncertainty as to the objective of Sir William Howe, who had embarked with his army at New York and, after some maneuvering, had put to sea, was the cause of the brigade's being stopped at Trenton, and also of its return to Philadelphia. On August 22d Washington received information that Howe's fleet had arrived in the Chesapeake, and he ordered General Nash to embark his brigade and Colonel Proctor's corps of artillery, if vessels could be procured for the purpose, and proceed to Chester; or, if vessels could not be procured, to hasten toward that place by land with all the dispatch he could. At Chester General Washington, with the remainder of his army, joined them, and they moved on to Wilmington, Delaware. It is unnecessary to state the further movement of the armies, which led up to the Battle of Brandywine, September 11, 1777. One hundred men of the North Carolina bridage were with General Maxwell, under the command of Colonel Alexander Martin, the rest of the North Carolina troops were with General Greene. I am indebted to Irving's Life of Washington for the following account of that battle:

"The Brandywine Creek, as it is called, commences with two branches, called the East and West branches, which unite in one stream, flowing from west to east about twenty-two miles, and emptying itself into the Delaware about 25 miles below Philadelphia. It has several fords; one called Chadd's Ford was at that time the most practicable, and in the direct route from the enemy's camp to Philadelphia. As the principal attack was expected here, Washington made it the center of his position, where he stationed the main body of his army, composed of Wayne's, Weedon's and Muhlenberg's brigades, with the light infantry under Maxwell. An eminence immediately above the ford had been intrenched in the night, and was occupied by Wayne's and Proctor's artillery. Weedon's and Muhlenberg's brigades, which were Virginia troops and formed General Greene's division, were posted in the rear on the heights as a reserve to aid either wing of the army. With these Washington took his stand. Maxwell's light infantry were thrown in the advance, south of the Brandywine, and posted on high ground each side of the road leading to the ford. The right wing of the army commanded by Sullivan, and composed of his division and those of Stephen and Stirling, extended up the Brandywine two miles beyond Washington's position. Its light troops and videttes were distributed quite up to the forks. A few detachments of unorganized and undisciplined cavalry extended across the creek on the extreme right. The left wing, composed of the Pennsylvania militia, under Major-General Armstrong, was stationed about a mile and a half below the main body, to protect the lower fords, where the least danger was apprehended. The Brandywine, which ran in front of the whole line, was now the only obstacle, if such it might be called, between the two armies.

"Early on the morning of the 11th, a great column of troops was descried advancing on the road leading to Chadd's Ford. A skirt of woods concealed its force, but it was supposed to be the main body of the enemy; if so, a general conflict was at hand. The Americans were immediately drawn out in order of battle. Washington rode along the front of the ranks, and was everywhere received with acclamations. A sharp firing of small arms soon told that Maxwell's light infantry were engaged with the vanguard of the enemy. The skirmishing was kept up for some time with spirit, when Maxwell was driven across the Brandywine below the ford. The enemy who had advanced very slowly did not attempt to follow, but halted on commanding ground, and appeared to reconnoiter the American position with a view to attack. A heavy cannonading commenced on both sides about ten o'clock. The enemy made repeated dispositions to force the ford, which brought on as frequent skirmishes on both sides of the river, for detachments of the light troops occasionally crossed over. One of these skirmishes was more than usually severe; the British flank guard was closely pressed, a captain and ten or fifteen men were killed, and the guard was put to flight, but a large force came to their assistance, and the Americans were again driven across the stream. All this while there was the noise and uproar of a battle; but little of the reality. The enemy made a great thundering of cannon, but no vigorous onset. . . ."

About noon Washington received information that the main body of the British under Howe and Cornwallis were coming along the Lancaster road, undoubtedly with the intention of taking Sullivan by surprise, and thus turning the right flank of the patriot army. If this was true (he sent a squad of cavalry to ascertain if it was true) the enemy was not in force opposite him, and he would cross the Brandywine, and crush the British on its south banks, while Sullivan held the army of Howe. Unfortunately as he was preparing to adopt his plan other information came that no troops had passed along the Lancaster road, and he was not willing to attack the whole British army with the force he had with him. Too late, however, he discovered that the first information was correct. The enemy was two miles in the rear of Sullivan's right and was marching down at a rapid rate, while a cloud of dust showed that there were more troops behind them.

"In fact," says Irving, "the old Long Island stratagem had been played over again. Knyphausen with a small division had engrossed the attention of the Americans by a feigned attack at Chadd's Ford, kept up with great noise and prolonged by skirmishes; while the main body of the army under Cornwallis, led by experienced guides, had made a circuit of seventeen miles, crossed the two forks of the Brandywine, and arrived in the neighborhood of Birmingham meeting house, two miles to the right of Sullivan. . . .

"Finding that thus Cornwallis had gained the rear of the army, Washington sent orders to Sullivan to oppose him with the whole right wing, each brigade attacking as soon as it arrived upon the ground. Wayne, in the meantime was to keep Knyphausen at bay at the ford, and Greene, with the reserve, to hold himself ready to give aid wherever required. . . .

"Sullivan on receiving Washington's orders advanced with his own, Stephen's and Stirling's divisions, and began to form a line in front of an open piece of wood. The time which had been expended in transmitting intelligence, receiving orders and marching, had enabled Cornwallis to choose his ground and prepare for action. Still more time was given him by a delay of the Americans in forming their line, arising from a mere point of etiquette. Lord Stirling's division had accidentally formed on the right of Sullivan; this was taking rank of him; the position had to be changed, and this change was taking place when Cornwallis advanced rapidly with his troops in the finest order, and opened a brisk fire of musketry and artillery. The Americans made an obstinate resistance, but being taken at a disadvantage, the right and left wings were broken and driven into the woods. The centre stood firm for a while, but being exposed to the whole fire of the enemy, gave way at length also. The British in following up their advantage got entangled in the wood. . . .

"The Americans rallied on a height to the north of Dilworth, and made a still more spirited resistance than at first, but were again dislodged and were obliged to retreat with heavy loss. While this was occurring with the right wing, Knyphausen, as soon as he learnt from the heavy firing, that Cornwallis was engaged, made a push to force his way across Chadd's Ford in earnest. He was vigorously opposed by Wayne, with Proctor's artillery, aided by Maxwell and his infantry. Greene was preparing to second him with his reserve, when he was summoned by Washington to the support of the right wing; which the commander-in-chief (who had himself gone to the right wing) had found in imminent peril. Greene advanced to the relief with such celerity, that it is said on good authority his division accomplished the march, or rather run, of five miles in less than fifty minutes. He arrived too late to save the battle, but in time to protect the broken masses of the left wing, which he met in full flight. Opening his ranks from time to time for the fugitives, and closing them the moment they had passed, he covered their retreat by a sharp and well directed fire from his field pieces. His grand stand was made at a place about a mile beyond Dilworth, which, in reconnoitering the neighborhood, Washington had pointed out to him as well calculated for a second position, should the army be driven out of the first. . . . Weedon's brigade was drawn up in a narrow defile, flanked on both sides by woods, and perfectly commanding the road; while Greene, with Muhlenberg's brigade, passing to the right, took his station on the road. The British came on impetuously, expecting but faint opposition. They met with a desperate resistance and were repeatedly driven back. It was the bloody conflict of the bayonet; deadly on either side, and lasting for a considerable time. Weedon's brigade, on the left, maintained its stand also with great obstinacy, and the check given to the enemy by these two brigades, allowed time for the broken troops to retreat. Weedon's was compelled at length by superior numbers to seek the protection of the other brigade, which he did in good order, and Greene gradually drew off the whole division in the face of the enemy, who checked by this vigorous resistance, and seeing the day far spent, gave up all further pursuit.

"The brave stand made by these brigades had, likewise, been a great protection to Wayne. He had for a long time withstood the attacks of the enemy at Chadd's Ford, until the approach on the right of some of the enemy's troops who had been entangled in the woods, showed him that the right wing had been routed. He now gave up the defense of his post, and retreated by the Chester road. Knyphausen's troops were too fatigued to pursue him; and the others had been kept back, as we have shown, by Greene's division. So ended the varied conflict of the day."

I have given this long account of the Battle of the Brandywine, because it is the clearest description of that battle that I have found. It does not help in solving the problem of the part that the North Carolina troops took in it, because Irving, with the exception of Weedon and Muhlenberg, describes the troops by divisions. Judge Clark says the North Carolina troops were in the division commanded by Lord Stirling (11 S. R., page 15). Mr. Ashe, History of North Carolina, page 581, says that they were in the division commanded by General Sullivan, and participated in the battle; but the management was so wretched that none of the brigades in Sullivan's division won any renown. The writer in a sketch of General Nash, in the Biographical History of North Carolina, 3d volume, adopts the view that they were with General Sullivan, but in Lord Stirling's division. It is quite probable that none of these assertions is correct, for Thomas Burke, who was himself on the battlefield, writing to Governor Caswell, September 17th, after stating that General Sullivan commanded the right wing, and the confusing reports in regard to the approach of Cornwallis and the discomfiture of General Sullivan at the ensuing battle, says: "The evil did not end here. Greene's division and Nash's brigade, which formed the chief strength of the centre, were ordered to the right to reinforce the troops of that wing. . . . None of the reinforcements had time to get up so as to engage, except Weedon's brigade, who checked the enemy and very gallantly covered the retreat of the whole army." (11 S. R., 621.) On the same day in a letter signed by himself, Penn and Harnett, it is said, "The North Carolina troops were not engaged in the late action."

Soon after the brigade joined General Washington a hundred light infantry men were chosen from it, and they were placed under the command of Colonel Alexander Martin. It is certain that these were part of General Maxwell's brigade at Chadd's Ford, and that both Captain Jacob Turner and Hal Dixon distinguished themselves there. A month later Turner was killed at the battle of Germantown.

Germantown, October 4, 1777, was the first battle in which the North Carolina Continental troops as a brigade took part.

"Germantown, at that time was little more than one continued street, extending two miles north and south. The houses were mostly of stone, low and substantial, with steep roofs and projecting eaves. They stood apart from each other, with fruit trees in front and small gardens. Beyond the village, and about one hundred yards east of the road, stood a spacious stone edifice, with ornamented grounds, statues, groves and shrubbery, the country seat of Benjamin Chew, Chief Justice of Pennsylvania previous to the Revolution. Four roads approached the village from above; that is, from the north. The Skippack, which was the main road, led over Chestnut Hill and Mount Airy down to and through the village toward Philadelphia, forming the street of which we have spoken. On its right and nearly parallel, was the Monatawney, or Ridge road, passing near the Schuylkill, and entering the main road below the village. On the left of the Skippack, or main road, was the Limekiln road, running nearly parallel to it for a time and then turning towards it, almost at right angles, so as to enter the village at the market place. Still further to the left or east, and outside of all, was the Old York road, falling into the main road some distance below the village.

"The main body of the British forces lay encamped across the lower part of the village, divided into almost equal parts by the main street, or Skippack road. The right wing commanded by General Grant was to the east of the road, the left wing to the west. Each wing was covered by strong detachments, and guarded by cavalry. General Howe had his headquarters at the rear. The advance (guard) of the army, composed of the 2d battalion of British light infantry, with a train of artillery, was more than two miles from the main body, on the west of the road, with an outlying picket stationed with two six pounders at Allen's house on Mount Airy. About three quarters of a mile, in the rear of the light infantry lay encamped in a field opposite Chew's House the 40th regiment of infantry under Colonel Musgrave.

"According to Washington's plan for the attack, Sullivan was to command the right wing, composed of his own division, principally Maryland troops, and the division of General Wayne. He was to be sustained by a corps de reserve composed of Nash's North Carolina and Maxwell's Virginia* brigades, and to be flanked by the brigade of General Conway. He was to march down the Skippack road and attack the left wing; at the same time General Armstrong, with the Pennsylvania militia, was to pass down the Monatawny, or Ridge Road and get upon the enemy's left and rear. Greene with the left wing composed of his own division and the division of General Stephen, and flanked by McDougall's brigade, was to march down the Limekiln Road, so as to enter the village at the market house. The two divisions were to attack the enemy's right wing in front, McDougall with his brigade to attack it in flank, while Smallwood's division of Maryland militia and Forman's Jersey brigade, making a circuit by the Old York Road, were to attack it in the rear."

This was an excellent plan, and notwithstanding the fog, had all the troops in Washington's army done their duty in that battle as faithfully as did the rank and file of the North Carolina brigade, the result would have been very different. That they fought well is the uncontradicted testimony of all. They had been ordered to the front by Washington himself (under whose eye they fought) to reinforce Sullivan and with him had pushed on a mile beyond the Chew House, driving the enemy before them, when Sullivan's troops, having expended all their ammunition, were alarmed by seeing the enemy gathering on their left and by the cry of a light horseman that they were getting around them, and fell back in a disorder that soon became a panic. In an overwhelming fog friends were mistaken for enemies, and what at first promised to be a complete victory was converted into as complete a defeat. It was after the brigade had passed the Chew House and through the camp of the British infantry that General Nash was wounded. Mr. Custis, who was a namesake and favorite of General Washington, and father of the wife of General R. E. Lee, writes thus of General Nash's death in the National Intelligencer, issue of February 22, 1841:

"While gallantly leading the North Carolina Brigade, that formed part of the reserve, into action, General Nash was mortally wounded. A round shot from the British artillery striking a sign post in Germantown, glanced therefrom and, passing through his horse, shattered the General's thigh on the opposite side. The fall of the animal hurled its unfortunate rider with considerable force to the ground. With surpassing courage and presence of mind, General Nash, covering his wound with both of his hands, gaily called to his men, 'Never mind me. I've had a devil of a tumble; rush on, my boys; rush on the enemy. I'll be after you presently.' Human nature could do no more. Faint from loss of blood and the intense agony of his wound, the sufferer was borne to a house hard by and attended by Dr. Craik by special order of the Commander-in-chief. The doctor gave his patient but feeble hopes of recovery, even with the chances of amputation, when Nash observed, 'It may be considered unmanly to complain, but my agony is too great for human nature to bear. I am aware that my days, perhaps hours, are numbered, but I do not repine at my fate. I have fallen on the field of honor while leading my brave Carolinians to the assault of the enemy. I have a last request to make of his Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief, that he will permit you, my dear doctor, to remain with me to protect me while I live, and my remains from insult.' Dr. Craik assured the General that he had nothing to fear from the enemy. It is impossible that they would harm him while living, or offer an insult to his remains; that Lord Cornwallis was by this time in the field, and, that under his auspices a wounded officer would be treated with humanity and respect. The dying patriot and hero then uttered these remarkable words: 'I have no favor to expect from the enemy. I have been consistent in my principles and conduct from the commencement of the troubles. From the very first dawn of the Revolution, I have ever been on the side of liberty and my country.' He lingered in extreme agony between two and three days and died admired by his enemies and admired and lamented by his companions in arms. On Thursday, October 9th, the whole American Army was paraded by order of the Commander in-Chief to perform the funeral obsequies for General Nash, and never did the warrior's last tribute peal the requiem of a braver soldier or nobler patriot than of the illustrious son of North Carolina . . . while the epitaph to be graven on his memorial monument should be the memorable words of the patriot and hero on the field of his fame: 'From the very first dawn of the Revolution, I have ever been on the side of liberty and my country.' "

*This is error. Maxwell's was a New Jersey brigade.

The advice of Mr. Custis has been taken. Those words of General Nash have been engraven on the monument erected to his memory by the Federal Government, on Guilford Battle Ground.

His military career was too brief for him to have gained the fame that might have been his had his life been spared.

Short as it was, however, he attracted the attention and secured the respect of Washington and his subordinates. In his dispatches Washington speaks of him as a brave and valuable officer. General Sullivan, in writing to the President of New Hampshire, testifies to his worth. Thomas Burke, then a member of Congress, writes of him that he was one of the best, most respected and regretted officers in the army, and Governor Caswell said his equal was not to be found among the officers who survived him. Colonel Edward Buncombe and Captains Henry Irwin and Jacob Turner were either killed or mortally wounded in this battle.

General McIntosh, of Georgia, was placed temporarily in command of the North Carolina brigade, and continued as such until May, 1778, when he was transferred to take command at Pittsburg and of the western frontier.

The brigade spent the winter of 1777-1778 at Valley Forge, about 23 miles west of Philadelphia. It seems to have endured with patience the terrible suffering of that winter, and to have taken its part in outpost duty. On the last day of 1777 there were present of them fit for duty 572 file, 425 sick, and 137 absent on duty (11 S. R., 703). The battalions were reformed by Washington in June, 1778. They took part in the Battle of Monmouth, June 29, 1778, in the division of Lord Stirling, and under the command of Colonel Clark. After a hot and arduous day the enemy retired that night behind a defile, where they had both their flanks secured by thick woods and morasses, while their front could only be approached through a narrow pass. Washington determined, notwithstanding, to attack them, so ordered General Poor, with his own and the Carolina brigade, to move round upon their right, and General Woodford upon their left, with the artillery to gall them in front. The impediments in their way, however, prevented their getting within reach before dark. They remained upon the ground they had been directed to occupy during the night, with intention to begin the attack early the next morning, while the army at large continued lying upon their arms on the field of battle, to be in readiness to support them. But the enemy about 12 o'clock that night marched away in such silence that, though General Poor lay extremely near them, they effected their retreat without his knowledge. Washington in his report of the battle said, "The behavior of the troops in general . . . was such as could not be surpassed."

In the reformation of the brigade alluded to above the number of battalions in the brigade were reduced from six to three. Colonel Sheppard's Tenth Regiment made the fourth. Colonels Lamb, Polk, Hogun, and numerous subordinate officers being thus displaced to return home to raise the four additional battalions, asked for by the Continental Congress. "Efforts to obtain recruits under the system of volunteering, even with the large bounties offered, proved unavailing, and the Legislature directed that 2,600 men should be detached from the militia to serve in the Continental army for nine months. They were known as the nine months men. A certain quota was apportioned to each county, and this number was again apportioned by the Colonel of the county among the militia companies, so that every militia company in the State had to furnish its proper share of these troops. Volunteers from each company were first to be called for and to these a bounty of $100 was offered; and then, to make up the deficiency in its quota each company, by ballot, selected the other men. Every one so selected became a Continental, and those who faithfully served for nine months were to be exempt from any military service for a period of three years. . . . Boards of Continental officers convened at Halifax and Moore's Creek to arrange officers for the new battalions, and Colonel Hogun was elected to command the first that should be organized. In July, 1778, he marched north with six hundred men." (Ashe, page 589 et seq.)

In August he reached Philadelphia and hastened on to Washington's headquarters at White Plains. The North Carolina Brigade had its cantonment for the winter of 1778-9 near Smith's Cove, on the west side of the Hudson, for the security for that pass and as a reinforcement to West Point, in case of necessity. On January 9, 1779, after a long delay (there had been no North Carolina brigadier since the death of Nash), James Hogun and Jethro Sumner were made Brigadier Generals by the Continental Congress.

Perhaps the most dashing exploit of the whole war was the capture of Stony Point, on July 16, 1779. Two hundred volunteers from the North Carolina brigade, under the command of Major Hardy Murfree, took part in the attack. Stony Point is a commanding hill, projecting far into the Hudson, which washes three-fourths of its base. The remaining fourth is, in a great measure, covered by a deep marsh, commencing near the river on the upper side and continuing into it below. But at its junction with the river is a sandy beach passable at low tide, and across the morass, itself, was a narrow causeway and bridge. The promontory was crowned by strong works, furnished with heavy ordinance, commanding the morass and causeway. Lower down were two rows of abatis, and the shore at the foot of the hill could be swept by war vessels anchored in the river. The garrison was about six hundred strong, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson.

When Washington suggested his plan to capture Stony Point to Mad Anthony Wayne, it is reported that he said: "General, I will storm hell, if you will only plan it." General Wayne then readily undertook the venture. Washington's plan involved the placing of large bodies of troops near as support for the volunteers from light infantry who were to make the attack upon the fort. These supporters were the regiments of Febiger and Meigs, a detachment under Major Hull and two hundred volunteers from the North Carolina brigade under Major Murfree. Irving in his Life of Washington, tells the remainder of the story:

"On the 15th of July, about midday, Wayne set out with his light infantry from Sandy Beach, fourteen miles distant from Stony Point. The roads were rugged, across mountains, morasses and narrow defiles, in the skirts of Dunderberg, where frequently it was necessary to proceed in single file. About eight in the evening, they arrived within a mile and a half of the fort, without being discovered. Not a dog barked to give the alarm—all dogs in the neighborhood had been privately destroyed beforehand. Bringing the men to a halt, Wayne and his principal officers went nearer, and carefully reconnoitered the works and their environs, so as to proceed understandingly and without confusion. Having made their observations they returned to the troops. About half past eleven, the whole moved forward, guided by a negro of the neighborhood who had frequently carried in fruit to the garrison, and served the Americans as a spy. He led the way accompanied by two stout men disguised as farmers. The countersign was given to the first sentinel, posted on high ground west of the morass. While the negro talked with him, the men seized and gagged him. The sentinel posted at the head of the causeway was served in the same manner; so that hitherto no alarm was given. The causeway, however, was overflowed, and it was some time after twelve o'clock before the troops could cross; leaving three hundred men under General Muhlenberg (?), on the western side of the morass as a reserve.

"At the foot of the promontory, the troops were divided into two columns, for simultaneous attacks on opposite sides of the works. One hundred and fifty volunteers, led by Lieutenant Colonel Fleury, seconded by Major Posey, formed the vanguard of the right column; one hundred volunteers under Major Stewart, the vanguard of the left. In advance of each was a forlorn hope of twenty men, one led by Lieutenant Gibbon, the other by Lieutenant Knox; it was their desperate duty to remove the abatis. So well had the whole affair been conducted, that the Americans were close upon the outworks before they were discovered. There was then severe skirmishing at the pickets. The Americans used the bayonet; the others discharged their muskets. The reports roused the garrison. Stony Point was instantly in an uproar. The drums beat to arms; every one hurried to his alarm post; the works were hastily manned, and a tremendous fire of grape shot and musketry opened upon the assailants.

"The two columns forced their way with the bayonet at opposite points, surmounting every obstacle. Colonel Fleury was the first to enter the fort and strike the British flag. Major Posey sprang to the ramparts and shouted, 'The fort is ours.' Wayne, who led the right column, received at the inner abatis a contusion on the head from a musket ball, and would have fallen to the ground, but his two aides-de-camp supported him. Thinking it was a death wound, 'Carry me into the fort,' said he, 'and let me die at the head of my column.' He was borne in between his aids, and soon recovered his self possession. The two columns arrived nearly at the same time and met in the center of the works. The garrison surrendered at discretion."

The loss of the Americans was fifteen killed and eighty-three wounded; that of the British, fifty-three killed and five hundred and fifty-three taken prisoners, among whom were a lieutenant colonel, four captains, and twenty-three subalterns.

Henry Cabot Lodge, in his Story of the Revolution, tells of the part that Major Murfree and his North Carolinians took in the storming of the fort: "Major Murfree and his North Carolinians in the center were delayed by the tide in crossing the morass, and as they came through they met an outpost. A heavy fire of grapeshot and musketry opened upon them. On they went without a pause as if they were the only troops on the field, and every other column and division did the same." Among other brave and worthy officers, Wayne mentioned the names of Lieutenant-Colonel Sherman and Majors Hull, Murfree, and Posey, "whose good conduct and intrepidity entitled them to that attention." Lieutenant John Daves, one of the North Carolina officers present, was among the severely wounded.

The disastrous defeat of General Robert Howe, in Georgia, in December, 1778, had caused him to be superseded by Major General Lincoln, whom Washington had sent south at the solicitation of the delegates (in the Continental Congress) from Georgia and South Carolina. The remainder of the battalions raised under the nine months plan from the militia of the State were sent to reinforce Lincoln in South Carolina, under the command of General Sumner and were engaged at the battle of Stono, June 20, 1779, and also under the command of Colonel Lamb in the unsuccessful joint attack upon the British defenses at Savannah, Georgia, October 9th. They fought well in both battles. The latter part of the year conditions were so threatening in the State of South Carolina that Washington ordered all the North Carolina Continentals to that State to reinforce Lincoln. General Hogun, in command, they, about seven hundred, reached Charleston and went into camp on March 3, 1780. A short time afterwards General Woodford, who had been detached from the northern army in December, arrived at Charleston, with about the same number of effectives.

The best short account of the fall of Charleston that I have found is in Ashe, page 608, et seq.:

"The British being in possession of Savannah, it was apprehended that Charleston would be their next point of attack, and strenuous efforts were made to put that city in a state of defense. On February 10th, Sir Henry Clinton, having arrived with an additional force from New York, disembarked on John's Island, and at the end of March he passed the Ashley River above Charleston, taking possession of the Neck, across which Lincoln, had as defensive measures, cut a canal, constructed abatis, and built strong redoubts and batteries. It was thought that the British fleet could be successfully opposed; but on April 9th, it passed the bar, ran by Fort Moultrie and took possession of the harbor. To prevent its ascent, the channel of Cooper River was hurriedly obstructed by sinking there the entire American fleet, and so the way was still open for General Lincoln to retire from the city if he had chosen to do so. But the citizens entreated him to hold the city, and in the vain hope of relief he yielded to their earnest appeals. It was expected that the Virginia Continentals (remainder of, under Colonel Buford, General Woodford had already arrived) as well as militia from that state and the two Carolinas, would come to his aid, and that he would be able to raise the siege when these succors came. On April 6th Colonel Harrington, with some of the North Carolina militia, arrived, having entered the city by way of Addison's ferry, and Governor Rutledge was collecting the South Carolina militia on the Pee Dee, and awaiting the arrival of the Virginia troops and Caswell's brigade.

"Day by day the enemy approached nearer and nearer, until at length, on April 24th, Lincoln made a determined sortie to drive off their working parties. The detachment for this assault numbered three hundred men from Hogun's North Carolinians, Woodford's Virginians and the South Carolina Continentals. The interruption to the operations of the enemy was ineffectual; and other than this one effort, Lincoln simply endured the trying ordeal of his unfortunate predicament. The fire of the British along the line was continuous, and daily a few of the brave defenders fell at their posts. In all the American loss was 89 killed and 140 wounded; that of the besieging force being about the same. At length, all hope of relief having faded away and all avenues of escape being closed, and the citizens wearying of the siege, General Lincoln convened a council of his officers, and by their advice agreed to surrender. The capitulation took place on May 12th. His army at that time numbered two thousand Continentals, five hundred of whom were then in the hospitals. In addition there were more than a thousand militia, nearly all North Carolinians, for there were but few South Carolina militia in the city.

"By the surrender the entire North Carolina line, embracing the new battalions as well as Hogun's brigade, was eliminated from the contest, all that were left being those on sick leave and such officers as were at home unemployed. Included in the surrender were General Hogun, Colonels Clark, Patten, Mebane, fifty-nine other officers and seven hundred and fourteen other soldiers. Under the terms of the capitulation the militia were paroled and allowed to return to their homes, but the Continentals were kept in the harbor. . . . Of the eighteen hundred regulars who went into captivity on May 12, 1780, only seven hundred survived when they were paroled. After an imprisonment of twelve months an exchange of officers was agreed on; those who had not died in captivity were landed on James River, where they were exchanged, and returned to the army."

In a biographical sketch of General Hogun's life in 4 Biog. His. N. C., by Judge Clark, it is said, "The regular troops headed by General Hogun, were conveyed to Haddrell's Point in the rear of Sullivan's Island, near Charleston. They there underwent the greatest privations of all kinds. They were nearly starved, but even a petition to fish, in order to add to their supply of food, was refused by the British. These troops were also threatened with deportation to the West Indies. General Hogun was offered leave to return on parole. Tempting as was the offer he felt that his departure would be unjust to his men, whose privations he had promised to share. He also knew that his absence would aid the efforts of the British, who were seeking recruits among these half-starved prisoners." The term "deportation" has attached to it in these latter days a signification so odious that it is well to pause here in the midst of the narration to explain that it was not a forcible deportation. The attempt was to induce the prisoners to enter on board the ships of war, or privateers, or to go as recruits to the regiments in the West Indies, or as volunteers against the Spanish settlements, and a considerable number of them chose to relieve themselves in that way of the severe privations of their imprisonment. But to resume, "He knew also that his absence would aid the efforts of the British, who were seeking recruits among these half-starved prisoners. He fell a victim to his sense of duty, and died at Haddrell's Point, January 4, 1781, where he fills the unmarked grave of a hero. History affords no more striking incident of devotion to duty, and North Carolina should erect a tablet to his memory and that of those who perished there with him."

Though Major Eaton's battalion, in the early summer of 1781, numbered 400, and General Sumner's brigade in April, 1782, contained 1,000 men, to which, probably, another thousand was added before the year was out, yet the history of the Continental line, strictly speaking, ended at General Lincoln's surrender at Charleston. The surviving officers were found very useful in organizing and leading the militia on several occasions, and General Sumner, with his newly enlisted regulars, 1,000 in number, fought bravely and suffered severely in the battle of Eutaw Springs, September 9, 1781, yet these events are beyond the plan of this article.

I am indebted again to Judge Clark for the following from the biography of James Hogun, sup.:

"The colonels of the ten North Carolina regiments of the Continental Line were:

"First Regiment, James Moore; on his promotion, Francis Nash; after his promotion, Thomas Clark (who, by the way, was the second husband of Nash's widow). Alfred Moore, afterwards judge of the United States Supreme Court, was one of the captains (of this regiment).

"Second Regiment, Robert Howe; after his promotion, Alexander Martin. On his resignation, John Patten. In this regiment Hardy Murfree, from whom Murfreesboro in Tennessee, is named, rose from captain to lieutenant-colonel; and Benjamin Williams, afterwards governor, was one of the captains. David Vance, grandfather of Governor Vance, was a lieutenant.

"Third Regiment, Jethro Sumner. After his promotion, it was consolidated with the First Regiment. In this regiment Hal Dixon was a lieutenant-colonel and Pinketham Eaton was major, both distinguished soldiers; and William Blount, afterwards United States Senator, was paymaster.

"Fourth Regiment, Thomas Polk. General William Lee Davidson, killed at Cowan's Ford, was lieutenant-colonel of this regiment.

"Fifth Regiment, Edward Buncombe, who died of wounds received at Germantown, and for whom Buncombe County is named.

"Sixth Regiment, Alexander Lillington, and afterwards, Gideon Lamb. John Baptista Ashe, of Halifax, who was elected governor in 1802, but died before qualifying, was lieutenant-colonel of this regiment.

"Seventh Regiment, James Hogun. After his promotion, Robert Mebane. In this regiment Nathaniel Macon, afterwards speaker of Congress and United States Senator, and James Turner, afterwards governor, served together as privates in the same company.

"Eighth Regiment, James Armstrong.

"Ninth Regiment, John Pugh Williams. Of this regiment, William Polk was major.

"Tenth Regiment, Abram Sheppard."

The Civilization of the Old South

By Mildred Lewis Rutherford.
(Historian-General the United Daughters of the Confederacy, 1911-1916.)

PART I.

The civilization of the Old South was truly unique—nothing like it before or since, nor will there ever be anything like it again.

Henry R. Jackson said:

"The stern glory of Sparta, the rich beauty of Athens, the splendors of Imperial Rome, the brilliancy of ancient Carthage—all pale before the glories of the Old South, the South as our forefathers lived it, the South as Washington, Jefferson, and Madison lived it, and, last but not least, the South as our Robert E. Lee lived it."

And Henry Grady said:

"In the honor held above estate; in the hospitality that neither condescended nor cringed; in frankness and heartiness and wholesale comradeship; in the reverence paid to womanhood and the inviolable respect in which woman's name was ever held—the civilization of the Old South has never been surpassed, and perhaps will never again be equaled by any people or nation upon this globe."

It is true that it has been compared to the Feudal System of the Middle Ages, when military lords exercised jurisdiction over serfs, allotted them land, collected taxes from them and in return demanded service in time of war—but there was no love lost between lord and serf.

It has been compared to the English tenant system, where the landlord leases the land, and, so long as the rent is paid, all is well, but if the tenant fails to pay his rent, then he is ejected without mercy—very rarely is there any love lost between the landlord and his tenant.

Very different was the relation that existed between the slave-holder and his slaves under the institution of slavery as it was in the Old South. By the way, the negroes in the South were never called slaves—that term came in with the Abolition crusade. They were our servants, part of our very home, and always alluded to as the servants of a given plantation or town home—as, "the servants of White Marsh," "the servants of Warner Hall," "the servants of Rosewall or Rosewell," or of Halscot "the servants of Cherry Hill," "the servants of Round Hill, of Silver Hall," etc. The servants had no surnames of their own before the war—they had none when they came to us from Africa—but they were known by the names of their owners or owners' estates. Thus it was that Nancy from the Thornton plantation after freedom became Nancy Thornton; and Tom from Warner Hall became Tom Warner.

There was something in the economic system of the Old South that forged bonds of personal interest and affection between the master's family and their servants—a pride that was taken the one in the other. The master would boast, "My servants are the best on all the plantations round, best workers, best mannered, most contented, the healthiest." And the servants in turn would say, "Our white folks are quality folks —they're none of your po' white trash. Aint nobody in the world like our 'Ole Marster' and 'Ole Mis'."

The negroes under the institution of slavery were well-fed, well-clothed, and well-housed. A selfish interest, if no nobler or higher motive, would have necessitated this, for the slave was the master's salable property. He would not willingly have allowed him to be injured physically. How hard it was for us to make the North understand this!

I never heard of a case of consumption, or rather tuberculosis among the negroes before the War between the States, and now negroes are dying by the hundreds yearly. I never heard of but one crazy negro before the war. Now asylums can not be built fast enough to contain those who lose their minds.

Negroes were immune from yellow fever before the war, and now this is no longer true.

I never saw a drunken negro before the war, for they were not allowed to buy, sell, or drink liquor without the master's consent, and crimes now so prevalent, largely on account of drunkenness, were unheard of then.

The negroes were forced to go to church and white pastors employed to preach to them. They were not allowed to work on Sunday. In proportion to population there were more negroes as church members than whites.

Marriage licenses must be obtained and the marriage take place in the presence of "Ole Marster" or the overseer.

Under the institution of slavery, the negro race increased more rapidly than the white. The reverse is the case today.

The servants were very happy in their life upon the old plantations. William Makepeace Thackeray, on a lecture tour in America, visited a Southern plantation. In "Roundabout Papers" he gives this impression of the slaves:

"How they sang! How they danced! How they laughed! How they shouted! How they bowed and scraped and complimented! So free, so happy! I saw them dressed on Sunday in their Sunday best—far better dressed than our English tenants of the working class are in their holiday attire. To me, it is the dearest institution I have ever seen and these slaves seem far better off than any tenants I have seen under any other tenantry system."

When a white child was born a negro of corresponding age was given. This negro owned the white child as much as the white child owned the negro. The negro refused to take an order from any young person save the owner, and the owner refused to have any order given by any one but the owner. Close ties of affection grew between the two. As an illustration of this, in a child's game, "Playing Dead," my sister was allowed to be covered in the leaves as dead, but my Ann Eliza could not play dead.

How restful the old life was! What a picture of contentment, peace, and happiness it presented! It was something like our grandmothers' garden as compared with the gardens of today.

The old-fashioned gardens with box-bordered beds so dignified and orderly and stately, with four o'clocks, holly hocks, larkspurs, touch-me-nots, wall flowers, bachelor buttons, snap dragons, mignonette, sweet alyssum, columbine and sunflower. How beautiful they were! What lovely overdresses the four o'clocks made for our flower dolls! What beautiful wreaths the larkspurs made, purple and white, which we pressed without compunction in the finest books in our father's library, totally unconscious of the ugly stain left behind.

There were long walks bordered with cape jessamine, banana shrubs, Chinese magnolias, crepe myrtle, rose beds filled with moss roses (I never see a pink moss rose now), yellow roses, red and pink single roses, tube roses; fences covered with Cherokee roses; summer houses covered with honeysuckle, yellow jasmine, woodbine, wisteria or white clematis. The odor of sweet grass and mimosa blooms, the rows of flowering pomegranate bushes, with double blossoms and the bearing pomegranate with single blossoms—apple trees in which the mocking birds' nests were found, and no one, white or black, could rob a mocking bird's nest, and, in the spring, doves cooing to their mates—that's like the old-time days never to return again.

The plantation was the center of social life in the old system and the "Big House" was the center of plantation life. It was always full and room for more. When all the beds were filled, pallets were made on the floors all over the house, and this gave trouble to no one—for there were plenty of servants to do the bidding, and mattresses, feather beds, pillows, quilts, blankets, and marvelous counterpanes in profusion, and linen closets always full.

In the "Big House" there lived "Ole Marster" and "Ole Mis." There were "Young Marster" and "Young Mis," and the children. Then there were the uncles and aunts and cousins to remotest kinship, with carriages, wagons, horses and servants. This gave trouble to no one, for there was plenty in the corn crib, plenty in the barn, plenty in the smokehouse, plenty in the pantry, plenty of turkeys, geese, ducks, guineas, chickens and squabs. Plenty of eggs, plenty of butter, cheese, cream, curds, clabber, sweetmilk and buttermilk—barn full, yard full, dairy full, pantry full. Shelves lined with jellies, jams, apple butter, quince and peach preserves, brandy peaches, marmalade, and large stone jars filled with pickles, sweet and sour.

The table fairly groaned with good things to eat, and there were no cooks like grandmother's old cooks. The kitchen was never in the house, but way out in the yard. This mattered little then, for there were plenty of little negroes to run back and forth with the covered dishes and hot batter cakes, hot waffles, hot rolls, and even hot ginger cakes. You young people will say "But it was not stylish to have so much on the table." No, not stylish, but far better than the little "dabs of nothingness" that you have today.

You may say, "What sinful waste!" Yes, there was a waste, but it was not sinful, for white and black had enough and to spare. The household servants always had what the white people at the Big House had, and the poor whites near by, if any, had more from "Ole Mis's" generous hand.

The stables were full of riding horses, buggy horses, carriage horses and ponies, so riding parties were the amusement for mornings and afternoons. Every girl and boy in the Old South learned to ride and drive at an early age. The little boys helped to take the horses to water, and to break the wildest colts. This made the masters' sons the finest cavalrymen in the Confederate Army.

In the evenings old Uncle Ned, the fiddler, would come into the great wide hall and the Virginia Reel would be danced, "Ole Marster" leading off with the prettiest girl there as his partner. Then the dignified minuet would be called for, and "Ole Marster" would lead out "Ole Mis" with the gallantry of Sir Galahad, and wind up with the cotillion, old Ned calling out the figures, keeping time with his foot and head, as he would sing out, "Salute your pardners," "Swing your pardners," "Sachez to the right," then "Sachez to the left," and finally "Promenade all."

Young people, we could not have danced the "Turkey Trot" nor the "Bunny Hug" had we desired.

Early hours were kept on the old plantation, for every one must be stirring at daybreak. "Ole Mis" would be the first to rise. Hers was a busy life. She started all the household servants to their work—the dry rubbers, and brass polishers. Ah, how those brass fenders, andirons and candlesticks shone! They had few carpets in those days and so the floors had to be polished by being dry rubbed. The garments had to be cut out for the seamstresses, and the looms gotten ready for the weavers, and the spinning wheels had to be started, breakfast had to be given out and the cooks must begin their work.

Early in the morning you could hear the beating of the dough—no biscuit mills then—and if we had beaten biscuits they were made with "elbow grease." You could hear the milkers as they went down to the cow lot, calling the little negroes to keep off the calves. You could hear Aunt Nanny feeding the chickens, with her chick, chick, CHICKEE, with a rising intonation of the voice on the last chickee, and then a cackle, and we knew one of the chickens for breakfast was about to meet its fate and have its neck wrung. No refrigerator in those days to keep the chickens on ice over-night.

I can see "Ole Mis" now, with her basket of medicines on her arm, going from cabin to cabin, doctoring the sick babies and the old negroes. Frequently all night long she lingered at the bedside of some dying negro, praying with him and when life had ceased, would close the staring glassy eyes. None in the "Big House" knew of this nightly vigil save "Ole Marster."

I can hear the musical ring of the bunch of keys fastened to her side, or in her key basket, as she walked along, for, while Uncle Eben kept the crib key, and Aunt Lishy the dairy key, and Aunt Nanny the smokehouse key, "Ole Mis" always kept the pantry key. She gave out every meal herself, weighed the flour, sugar, butter, lard, and meal, measured the coffee, and she always skimmed the cream in the dairy and prepared the milk for the churns, and made the curds.

There was such an unjust article to the South in the New York Times last year (1915). Edna Ferber, the authoress, is represented as saying that "The kitchens of the Southern women were left to the device of a company of slaves who ran the house pretty much to suit themselves. The Southern women never knew what provisions there were in the kitchen or cellar or how much food went out each day to furnish feasts in the near-by cabins. They knew nothing of housekeeping."

What absolute ignorance this showed of life in the Old South! Fortunately a Southern girl who had statistics in hand was ready to answer Miss Ferber. She found in a trunk of papers and letters belonging to her great-grandmother, who lived on her plantation in Washington County, Georgia, facts to contradict this in a most certain way. She found the "Plantation Book of 1851," in which the daily routine of work by the mistress of the plantation was given. In this memorandum book was kept not only the household duties, but how many pounds of cotton had been picked by the women and children on the plantation—"Martha 806 lbs., Mary 1,243 lbs., and Eliza 920 lbs." etc., and the prize money allowed them for picking over a certain amount, and then "something to George who couldn't pick, but who helped with the baskets."

Then followed the exact weight of the lard and the meat given to each family—"John and his family 62 lbs. of meat, Lewis, Patty and Martha 30 lbs." Then the amounts given to the decrepit negroes in the cabins. Finally the prescriptions left by the doctor for two of her negro patients. Then the death of a negro baby is recorded. The birth and death of the negroes were always recorded in the Family Bible at the Big House.

Now, when Miss Sarah Prince Thomas (Carol North) sent her answer to the article in the New York Times, and asked that it be printed to contradict Miss Ferber's statements, it was returned, saying that they did not need it. Was this just?

From early childhood we of the South were taught all work was honorable, and every act, even sweeping a room or picking up chips could be made as acceptable in God's sight as any service an archangel could perform.

Each child had some special duty every day. The girl, as soon as she was able to hold a needle or know upon what finger to put the thimble, was made to hem the towels, the table napkins, the tablecloths, the servants' aprons, or to aid in drying the cut glass and silver, for "Ole Mis' always looked after this herself; and the boys were given the care of some one animal to feed and care for, or some gates to lock and unlock, and no one else, not even the negro each child owned, was allowed to do this work for them.

It is true the aristocrat of the Old South did not go into his blacksmith shop to shoe his horse nor his wife into the kitchen to cook, or to the wash tub to wash, but it was not because they were ashamed or scorned to do it, but because there was no need for them to do these things.

History has greatly maligned the old aristocrat of the South. He was not "haughty," he was not "purse proud," and he did not consider himself "of finer clay" than any one else, as history has unjustly represented him.

Aristocracy then was gauged by manners and morals, and not by the size of the bank account, as I fear is too much the case today. Far more time was spent in cultivating the graces and charms of life than in amassing fortunes. They realized that "Manners are of more importance than money and laws"—for manners give form and color to our lives. They felt, as Tennyson said, "Manners are the fruit of lofty natures and noble minds."

It will take us a long time to undo the falsehoods of history about the civilization of the Old South.

Who was the head of the plantation? Why, "Ole Mis"; every one on the plantation must obey "Ole Mis"; and "Ole Marster" said so and he obeyed "Ole Mis" too. Her life was a long life of devotion—devotion to her God, devotion to her church—she was really the pillar of the church—devotion to her husband, to her children, to her kinfolks, to her neighbors and friends and to her servants. She could not be idle for she must ever be busy.

"Ole Marster" could delegate many of his duties to the overseer, while he entertained his guests. He would rise early in the morning, eat his breakfast—and such a breakfast! Broiled chicken, stuffed sausage, spareribs, broiled ham and eggs, egg bread, corn muffins, hot rolls, beaten biscuits, batter cakes or waffles with melted butter, syrup or honey, and the half not told. I can taste those waffles now. My, how delicious they were! Then, after smoking his Havana cigar, he would mount his saddle horse and ride over the plantation to see if the orders given the day before had been fully carried out. Then give the next day's orders, ride to a neighboring plantation and return in time for an early dinner. Dinner was always at midday on the old plantation. If it were summer time, "Ole Marster" would lie down upon the wide veranda or in the spacious hall upon one of those old mahogany sofas, covered with black horse hair, and a little darkey with a turkey tail fan or a peacock feather brush standing at his head to fan him and keep off flies, while he took his noonday nap. If it were winter, he would go into his library, and, before a large, open fireplace with whole logs of wood, he would discourse upon the topics of the day with visitors.

There was no subject with which "Ole Marster" was not at home—whether politics, philosophy, religion, literature, poetry, or art. "Ole Marster's" sons for generations had been well educated and had a perfect familiarity with the classics —they could read Greek and Latin better than some of us can read English today. The best magaines of the day were upon his library table, and the latest books upon his library shelves.

There were no public schools in the South before the Reconstruction period. The teachers on the plantations were tutors and governesses from the best colleges of the North and South, and in the private schools in the towns and cities were men and women whose education was beyond question. It was somewhat different in the Old Field Schools. There the teacher sometimes knew little beyond readin' and 'ritin' and 'rithmetic, and was considered very learned if he carried his scholars beyond "the rule of three."

"Ole Marster" was rarely as religious as "Ole Mis," and, if he wouldn't have family prayers, "Ole Mis" would, but "Ole Marster" always had a reverence for religion and made his negroes attend church regularly and raised his children with a reverence for Sunday and holy things.

"Ole Miss" often put on a grandmother's cap when only thirty-five—what will the young grandmother of today say to that? Girls married at an early age, for a home was ready—"They never came out, for they had never been in."

How handsome "Ole Marster" was in his broadcloth suit and his silk beaver hat, his pump-soled boots, his high stock and collar, and his gold watch and chain with fob. Bill Arp said the aristocrat was known by the way he toyed with the fob upon his chain.

How quaint and beautiful "Ole Mis" was in her lace cap and satin bows! I wish I had a black silk apron with pockets in it like my grandmother used to wear. What long, deep pockets there used to be in the skirts—sometimes pockets on both sides!

The entertainments would last for weeks at neighboring plantations ten or twenty miles apart. The old family carriage would come before the door, and the maids with the bandboxes and the valets with the horse-hair trunks, with brass nail heads, would strap them behind and cover them with a leather curtain; then they would follow the young people in a spring wagon to the place of entertainment. I can see now just such a party—the old family carriage, high up on elliptical springs, the driver's seat above the top of the carriage, and the steps which unfolded down, and then folded up.

The footman was there to let down the steps, the lovers were there to assist in mounting the steps, and Bill Arp said the true aristocrat was known not only by the size of her foot, but by the graceful way she could manage her crinoline in mounting the steps of the carriage or descending therefrom. The lovers would mount their horses and act as a body-guard to the appointed place.

The girls were dressed in dainty lawns and muslins—for no girl before her marriage, or until she had passed the marriageable age, was allowed to wear velvet, silk, satin, or lace. On their heads were the daintiest straw bonnets, trimmed with pink roses—a bunch over each ear—and bows of pink ribbons to tie beneath the chin, and the dearest black net gloves and the daintiest black slippers, with low heels, or no heels at all. Their lovers would have thrown not only their cloaks, Sir Walter-like, but themselves in the mud rather than those dainty feet should be soiled by the mud. And it was considered dreadful if more than the tip of that slipper should show. What would our grandmothers have said to these short dresses of today?

Hunting parties, riding parties, fishing parties, boating parties, tournaments, charades, dances, and all sorts of joys never dreamed of by the young people of today—no sitting out in the moonlight on the lawns, no hiding in dark corners of the verandas, no love-making after the old people had gone to bed, no automobile rides after dark, no dancing until daylight, and consequently runaway marriages were rarely heard of—and divorces were rarer. While the young men were on their fox hunts, the young girls would be employed with their embroidery—exquisite work they did!

But, oh, the preparation for a wedding feast! Weeks beforehand the plans were laid. "Hunter's round" had to be packed in spices, fruit cake to be made, raisins seeded, citron sliced, almonds blanched, and later the cakes iced, pyramids of cakes graduating in octagon shape from very large at the bottom to small at top and capped with a figure of the bride with her wedding veil and the groom in black broadcloth that had been bought from some confectionery shop. Little fence rails of icing around the different layers of cakes mounted one upon the other; bunches of grapes made of icing and covered with gold or silver leaf; roses made of white tarlatan and rimmed with icing. How we used to stand around—white children and black—and beg for the cones or the bowls that held the icing after the cakes were finished! I can see, now, the little smeared faces—for the owners unhesitatingly licked the bowls. Then the blanc mange shaped in so many wonderful molds of pineapple, muskmelon, rabbits and roses. Then pig's feet jelly, so stiff, and cut into little squares just big enough for a mouthful—how delicious they were!

Then the day of the wedding! There was the making of the chicken salad and the slicing of the beef tongue and ham and the roasting of turkeys and the icing of the little cakes, the making of the wafers that fairly melted in the mouth, and then the sweet wafers rolled over and oh! so crisp and delicious, and beaten biscuit by the bushel, the watermelon rind preserves cut into such equisite shapes, fish and bird and flower, and shaped with an artist's eye—the pride of the housekeeper, brought out to be seen if not to be eaten—the mango pickles, peach pickles, brandy peaches, artichoke pickles, cucumber pickles, and cherry pickles! Then the boiled custard and the syllabub—we had no ice cream in those days, for manufactured ice was unknown. Every member of the family present had to take home some of the wedding cake, every young person must have some of the cake to dream on, and to name the corners of the room. The wedding guests lingered on for days, and even weeks, after the wedding was over, and the feasting continued until the last guest was gone.

Those happy days are no more—gone, never to return, and the civilization as our granmothers lived it, went with it. Happy are those whose memory holds these days in remembrance! My heartfelt sympathy goes out to those who shall never know of them!

Veterans, didn't we have a good time when hog killing time came! Weren't the pig tails and the crackling bread fine? Don't we feel sorry for these young people who never ate a roasted pig tail, or never spent a Christmas on the old plantation?

Time was measured to Christmas, and three weeks before Christmas Day the wagons would go to the nearest city or town to lay in the Christmas supplies. Every negro man had to have a complete outfit, from hat to shoes; every negro woman had to have the same from head handkerchief to shoes; each negro child every article of clothing needed; and warm shawls, and soft shoes, or some special gifts had to be bought for the old negroes too feeble to work. Then there were the barrels of apples, oranges, cocoanuts, boxes of almonds, Brazil nuts, English walnuts, hazelnuts, raisins, citron and currants; then candies galore, kisses with adorable verses, sugar plums, lemon drops, gum drops, peppermint, cinnamon and lemon candy by the quantity, and last but not least, some mysterious packages that were stowed in mother's large wardrobe, which mammy told us with a grave shake of the head were "Laroes catch medloes," and for fear they might be animals that would bite us, we religiously let them alone, and forgot to ask about them when Christmas was over.

How happy all were, white and black, as the cry of "Christmas Gif' " rang from one end to the other of the plantation, beginning early in the morning at the Big House and reaching every negro cabin—Christmas can never be the same again.

As in a family life when a child is disobedient and must be punished, so in plantation life a disobedient or unruly negro had to be whipped or punished. It was natural that he should prefer to run away to escape a punishment he justly deserved and knew he would surely receive, especially tempted to run into a free State when incentives were offered to him to come and be transported by some underground way and hidden from the owner. It was perfectly natural also for him to give the most exaggerated reports of his treatment to willing listeners, who really set a premium upon these exaggerations.

"Aunt Cinthy," living in Florida where Northern tourists so often go for the winter, understood this. When reproached for saying what was absolutely false about the condition of the negro under slavery, she said: "Honey, I am jest obleeged to zaggerate a leetle about these things to edify the Northern tourists—they wouldn't give me any money if I didn't."

The unnatural thing to the Southern planter was how educated and intelligent men and women of the North could believe he would willingly injure his salable property by hitching him to a plow, or allowing him to be cruelly beaten. To him there was no difference between hiding his negro worth $1,200, or more, and hiding his pocketbook which contained the same amount of money. This interference with his personal property was stealing, no matter how viewed, and it irritated him beyond measure. He knew perfectly well, should he retaliate by taking the horses of the abolitionists from their stables, or cows from their barns, or cattle from their fields, or furniture from their homes, or bank notes from their pockets, it would quickly have been a question of law and imprisonment. It has been estimated that 75,000 negroes were thus hidden from their owners before 1860.

These fanatics took out "Personal Liberty Bills" contrary to the Constitution, to protect them, on the plea that there was a Higher Power than the Constitution. Indeed, in their fanaticism, they publicly burned the Constitution, and even said if the Bible stood for slavery, better burn the Bible, too.

Now, there is no doubt that this was one of the many interferences with Southern rights which forced Southern men to advocate secession in order to secure the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution. Many think because this interference with the runaway slaves was one of the occasions of war that the war was fought to hold the slaves. Never was there a greater mistake. Out of the 600,000 men in the Confederate army 400,000 never owned slaves. What were those men fighting for? There were 315,000 slave-holders in the Northern army. Did they wish their slaves freed? General Lee freed his slaves before the war began. General Grant did not free his until the Thirteenth Amendment passed, for Missouri's slaves were not intended to be freed by the Emancipation Proclamation.

Southern men always believed in State Sovereignty, and Southern men always have stood by the Constitution. Fair-minded Northern men saw this and said the South had by the Constitution the right to secede and contended that the Abolition Party was only a minority party in the North. George Lunt, of Boston, said, "The majority of the men in the North felt outraged at the actions of the Republican party at the time in interfering with the rights of the Southern States."

Had the South prevailed, the Union would have been preserved and that too by the Constitution. Our negroes would have long ago been freed by gradual emancipation, as Southern slave-holders had already done, were desirous of doing still, and, had no interference come from the abolitionists, there would be now no race problems to adjust.

Neither would there have been any need to change the Constitution except to legislate more strongly to enforce the laws against the slave trade as it was being still carried on by Northern States contrary to law, and the right to free their own slaves, as was claimed by the slaveholders of the Southern States. State Sovereignty would still remain, while the inexpediency of secession would have been proven by war. We would have, today, not only a grander and more glorious Union with no danger threatening us from a centralized government, but we would have a true democracy with States Rights stressed, as President Wilson advocates, a government formed of the people, by the people and for the people—knowing no North, no South, no East, no West.

PART II.

What Made the Civilization of the Old South?

It was, undoubtedly, the institution of slavery.

Why then did not the institution of slavery as it existed in Egypt, in Greece, in Rome, in Russia, in France, in the British Colonies, in New England, and other Northern States, produce the same civilization? That it did not, history has proven. There must have been another reason, then, than the mere institution itself.

The difference evidently was in the slave-holders of the South—men of that old Cavalier stock having the fear of God which gave them minds tuned to justice, and hearts trained to love, and pocketbooks opened to the needs of humanity, and I think the open pocketbooks had much to do with it. These men of the Old South lived with open-handed hospitality. One rarely heard of slaveholders in the South amassing great wealth like Stephen Girard of Philadelphia, or Peter Faneuil of Boston, Mass. The Southern slaveholders did not drive close bargains, but were generous in all their dealings, believing in the doctrine of "live and let live." Many slaveholders lived far beyond their means, and the surrender found them greatly in debt on account of liberality to their slaves.

From Jamestown and Plymouth Rock flowed two mighty streams of influence—dissimilar and, for more than a hundred years, entirely separate—two types of men with distinct ideals of life. One loved England and the established church, and came simply to investigate the New World and its possibilities, and fully intended to return to England some day, and had no desire to withdraw from the mother church.

The other had no love for England and had a grievance against the established church, deliberately planned to make a new home in this country, and never desired or intended to return to the mother land or mother church.

The backbone of the Virginia stream, or the Jamestown

Colony, was composed of men from leading families in England, gentlemen of the best English society, the landed gentry born to wealth and very loyal to their king. They were of the Cavalier stock. Many had lost their fortunes by high living, no doubt, and desired to come to this new world, expecting to find it a veritable Eldorado. When they decided to remain they patterned their social institutions after England, where they had been accustomed to large landed estates with tenants or servants. Coming with this old patriarchal idea of life, they became an agricultural people, making a diffusive civilization, settling on burgesses or plantations, having their indentured servants and living as in their old home.

Not so with the New England stream or Plymouth Rock Colony. They, too, were Englishmen, but did not come from the landed gentry, but from Puritan stock. They had a grievance with England in regard to an interference with their liberty to worship God as they pleased. They did not love the king or the landed gentry, so they began to lay the foundations of new social institutions and to set up new altars of justice and religion, and thus really became autocrats in the administration of the law.

The Jamestown Colony coming from English blood born to rule, their very instincts of life tended to develop political leaders and statesmen.

Their life on the plantations under the institution of slavery in controlling their slaves, fitted them to control themselves and others, so we find for fifty out of seventy years of the early government of our Republic, Southern men filled the Presidential chair. Every man from the South was reëlected for a second term, and two offered a third term, while not a President from other sections during this period ever held a second term. Thus was the ability of Southern men to control the affairs of State acknowledged by the people of the country.

The Plymouth Rock Colony, settling in towns and cities, made a cohesive civilization and developed traders, manufacturers, and men fitted for commercial control of the country. Their nearness to each other in the cities and towns also developed literary instincts, and there the leading men of letters were found during those early days of the Republic. A literary atmosphere was created by close contact and Massachusetts particularly produced many poets and philosophers, and the finest essay writers of that day came from New England.

These people were a methodical, painstaking people, exact in all business calculations, in all State regulations. They instigated research, and undertook historical investigations and so we find not only the statistics regarding their affairs accurately kept, but everything pertaining to their history recorded.

The Jamestown Colony did not write their history or accurately keep their statistics—hence we are suffering for this today, because our statistics have been prepared by those who did not know them as we did not know them ourselves, and we are often forced to go to the British Museum and other archives in England to find some of the history of those early days.

While the men of the South were eminently literary, they could not as in New England create a literary atmosphere, for they lived miles apart and rarely had any opportunity to meet in groups to discuss literary topics. They had the ability to write books, and they wrote much for local papers, but there was no need to print books for the money that would come to them from the printing.

The South produced great orators, and great political statesmen whose writings have come down in the political history of our country, excelled by no other section.

The Jamestown Colony thought little of the value of statistics. They were big-hearted, open-handed, free livers, given to hospitality, and as was said before, often lived far beyond their means. The care of their slaves was always a very heavy expense. The institution of slavery brought on an immunity from drudgery and gave leisure for the cultivation of the mind and manners. It made gentlemen and gentlewomen.

There was little attempt at grandeur or display—a beautiful simplicity was the charm of the life of the Old South. There was no need to study ethics, it was inborn in white and black. While there were different degrees of wealth—one man owning more slaves than another, or men of business affairs in the towns and cities owning few or no slaves, yet there was little difference in social standing—the line being drawn on education, manners and morals more than on the family tree and the pocketbook. Intellectual advantages and manners were to them of paramount importance. Character always counted for more than blood or money. And sneer as one may at the chivalry of the Old South, it was that which sweetened Southern life. Southern men were not only the champions of the women of their households, but the protectors of all women.

Now, while the Plymouth Rock Colony also produced gentlemen and gentlewomen, they were of a different type. While at heart they may have been just as true they lacked the social graces, and charming manners that the civilization of the Old South produced.

This difference came out very strikingly when Thomas Jefferson and John Adams were at the same time representatives from the United States Government in France. They had with them their daughters, Martha Jefferson and Abigail Adams—both well educated young women. Queen Marie Antoinette said that Martha Jefferson had the most exquisitely gracious manners she had ever seen in any young girl, and could be at home in any royal court; while the prim manners of Abigail Adams, the little New England maid, oppressed her.

The Jamestown settlers and their descendants, while not Puritanical in their religion, were religious. While Jonathan Edwards was preaching "Hell Torments" from a New England pulpit, the churchmen in Virginia were preaching "The love of God to sinful, dying men."

Read that tablet on Old Cape Henry Lighthouse commemorating the planting of the Cross by THIRTY members of that Jamestown Colony, April 26, 1607.

Read Richard Crashaw's Prayer, that was used in the daily service at Jamestown, in which is found: "Arm us against difficulties, and strengthen us against base thoughts and temptations. Give us faith, wisdom and constancy in thy service."

Read how the Rev. Robert Hunt held daily services under the stretched sails of one of those first three vessels that brought over this first permanent English Colony.

Go to Jamestown Island today and see the remains of that old church built there. Read the history of that church and see in Virginia churches today the remains of the communion service used there.

Read of that first Fast Day, and that first Thanksgiving Day before even the Pilgrim Fathers had left England.

Read of the missionary work of Alexander Whitaker, the first Protestant missionary to American Indians.

Yes, they were religious, but they believed in a religion of joy and happiness and never believed in a religion that carried a long and sanctimonious face.

The Plymouth Rock Colony were Puritans in word and deed. They recognized no church, no creed, no king by divine right. They said they were only responsible to God and to their own consciences. Life with them was simply a preparation for death, but their liberty became intolerance, and having been persecuted they also began to persecute. They allowed no Christmas festivities, no May Day joys, and their children were actually punished for being merry. A man was even forbidden to kiss his wife on Sunday. Nathaniel Hawthorne once said, "Let us thank God for such ancestors, but let us also thank Him that each generation brings us one step farther on in the march of ages."

The Cavaliers and their descendants and the men who settled the Southern colonies, into whose blood came that of the Irish, the Scotch, the Welsh, the French Huguenots, made up a people who have no superiors in the world—and today, after all these years, the purest Anglo Saxon blood out of rural England is to be found in the Southern States, and Englishmen have testified that the purest English is spoken not in New England, but in the Southern States.

The Puritans and their descendants and the other colonies that settled the North, into whose blood came the Dutch, the Swedes, the Danes, the Quakers, made a sturdy race, whose strength of character and business qualifications have always made them prominent as men of large affairs in the business world, and has given them great prominence in religious activities and ability in financing large undertakings. While it is written that Robert Morris, of Pennsylvania, financed the Revolution, we must not forget that Thomas Nelson, of Virginia, borrowed on his own credit, $2,000,000 for the Continental Congress and this money was never returned to him.

By the way, it was the American Revolution that brought the Cavalier and Puritan with their descendants close together to form one deep, swift current of national life, and the difference in Puritan and Cavalier blood was forgotten in the one mighty united effort to gain American independence. When Massachusetts suffered, every Southern colony suffered with her and quickly came to aid her. George Mason, of Virginia, wrote to his children to go in deep mourning when the services were held to pray for the relief of Massachusetts. When the Boston Port Bill passed, every one of the Southern colonies responded with aid to Massachusetts.

At the time of the Revolution, every colony was a slave holding colony. There really was no question of abolition of slavery and no sectional feeling until the time of the Missouri Compromise in 1820, which drew attention to the political power of the slave holding states.

Who was most responsible for the bringing over of African slaves—the North or the South? How glad I am to right a wrong against Massachusetts! It was a Dutch vessel, in

The strongest testimony is a paper in the possession of the descendants of Governor Yeardley, who was one of the Jamestown Colony to buy these Africans. He says they were bought in a spirit of humanity, with no thought of later commercial value. These creatures were suffering horribly on that slave ship and the Jamestown settlers felt they must be relieved, so bought them, and then tried to civilize them by putting them to work.

If African slavery was a sin, the Spaniards and English were the sinners. It is true the slave trade in the United States was begun by Massachusetts, and in the main carried on by her, not as a private enterprise, but by the authority of the Plymouth Rock Colony (Colonial Entry Book, Vol. IV, p. 724).

Slavery was abolished in the Northern Colonies from no conscientious scruples, but simply because the slave labor was unprofitable (Fiske's Critical Period of American History, p. 73).

Southern planters never, if it could be avoided, allowed their slaves to be sold at public outcry. It only happened when a man died without a will—then members of the family tried to buy the slaves in by families.

The South has suffered greatly from misrepresentations in regard to the institution of slavery. History has grossly maligned, not only the institution, but the slaveholder. Cruelty as practiced in East Indies, the Barbadoes and elsewhere have been repeated and located in the South. One traveler declared he saw in his travels a negro in a cage exposed to wild birds and his eyes literally pecked out—and encyclopedias and historians have located it in South Carolina. In the first place there are no wild birds in South Carolina to have done the pecking, and in the second place no Southern slaveholder would have stood for this for a moment.

The slaveholder has been accused of cruelty in separating mother and child on the slave block. The selling of slaves in the South did not separate mother and child as often or with such cruelty as did the slave traffic in Africa—as did the hiding of the fugitive slaves from their owners—as did the "Exodus Order" in Reconstruction days. Southern States had very rigid laws along this line. In Louisiana, if a slaveholder separated mother and child, he must pay $1,000 and give up six of his slaves. Other states also had binding laws. We find, in the Massachusetts Continental Journal, March 1, 1778, an advertisement of a slave mother to be sold "with or without her six months' old child."

The Southern planter has been accused of cruelty to his slaves—no cruelty on the part of any overseer can compare to that of the middle passage on the slave ships, where, on that long voyage, they were huddled as standing cattle and suffered from hunger and thirst so that they died by the hundreds. Let it be remembered that no Southern man ever owned a slave ship. No Southern man ever commanded a slave ship. No Southern man ever went to Africa for slaves.

General Lee said, "There was no doubt that the blacks were immeasurably better off here than they were in Africa—morally, physically, and socially." He thought the freeing of them should be left in God's hands and not be settled by tempestuous controversy.

The South has been vilified for not educating the negro in the days of slavery. The South was giving to the negro the best possible education—that education that fitted him for the workshop, the field, the church, the kitchen, the nursery, the home. This was an education that taught the negro self-control, obedience, and perseverance—yes, taught him to realize his weaknesses and how to grow stronger for the battle of life. The institution of slavery as it was in the South, so far from degrading the negro, was fast elevating him above his nature and his race.

We dared not teach the negroes on the plantation to read lest men of the John Brown type would urge them to rise, burn and kill our men, women and children on the plantation. Nat Turner, a free negro, did learn to read and was responsible for that insurrection in 1836 that resulted in the murder of sixty whites.

No higher compliment was ever paid the institution of slavery than that by the North, which was willing to make the negro its social and political equal after two hundred years of civilization under Southern Christianizing influence. Never has been recorded in history such rapid civilization from savagery to Christian citizenship.

Charles E. Stowe said, "There must have been something in the institution of slavery of value to have produced such a beautiful Christian character as Uncle Tom" in his mother's book.

The black man ought to thank the institution of slavery—the easiest road that any slave people have ever passed from savagery to civilization with the kindest and most humane masters. Hundreds of thousands of the slaves in 1865 were professing Christians and many were partaking of the communion in the church of their masters.

All that the South wishes is justice. This she has never had. In all of her history she has never been an invader but a defender of rights.

The War between the States taught us of the South our unpreparedness. The war in Europe is teaching our whole nation our unpreparedness. Thank God for President Wilson—a man of peace and a man of vision! The Revolutionary War brought Cavalier and Puritan together in a common love of country, so we, today, North, South, East, and West are being brought more closely together than ever before as true Americans under one flag and loyal to a Democratic Government with State Sovereignty stressed. We must be ready, after this war ends, to lend a helping hand to all nations needing help—for no blessing will come to us if we allow selfishness to engulf us.

Remember that this civilization that has replaced the old civilization rests with you and me whether it shall be a better civilization or not. Upon the individual man and woman in this country rests a fearful responsibility. Shall our influence—unconscious influence—which is the strongest—be for the upbuilding or the pulling down of this great Nation which God has entrusted into our keeping? God grant that we shall one and all stand ever on the side of RIGHT.

Colonel Hardy Murfree, of the North Carolina Continental Line*

By Colonel W. L. Murfree.

Hardy Murfree was born in Hertford County, North Carolina, on the 5th of June, 1752. At the early age of twenty-three he was appointed Captain of the Second Regiment of the Continental line of North Carolina by the Provincial Congress, which met at Halifax, August 21, 1775. The earliest action of this body was to pledge the coöperation of North Carolina with the other colonies in raising a Continental army for the common defense of the country. In fulfillment of this pledge, after directing the formation of a force of "Minute-men," designed for local operations, it proceeded to organize two regiments, which became a portion of the Continental army, and which served throughout the Revolutionary war.

Hardy Murfree's father, William Murfree, was a man of prominence in the community in which he lived, and was a member from Hertford County in the North Carolina Congress, or Convention, as it would be called in the language of the present day, which convened at Halifax, in the following year on the 12th of November, 1776. The duty of this body, as described in the call issued for its formation by the Committee of Safety, was "not only to make laws, but also to form a constitution which was to be the foundation of all law; and as it was well or ill ordered, would tend to the happiness or misery of the State."—(Wheeler's History of North Carolina, pp. 84, 85, 86.)

That the constitution framed by this body was "well ordered," is very manifest from the fact that it proved so

*This Biographical Sketch of Colonel Hardy Murfree was delivered before the Tennessee Historical Society, at Murfreesboro, Tennessee, December 8, 1885, when Major D. D. Maney, "on behalf of all the descendants of Hardy Murfree and himself," presented to that historic organization the sword of this distinguished officer of the North Carolina Continental Line, which was accepted by Judge John M. Lea. Colonel W. L. Murfree lived in St. Louis, Missouri.

satisfactory to the people of North Carolina that, without amendment, it continued to be the organic law of the State from 1776 to 1835, a period of 59 years.

The two regiments contributed by North Carolina to the general defense, passed, as soon as they were organized, under the control of the Continental Congress, and acted chiefly in the main body of the army, under the command of Washington.

In the daring assault which resulted in the capture of Stony Point, there was selected from the North Carolina troops a battalion of picked men, and Hardy Murfree, who was then a Major, was placed in command. At the time there had been organized a corps of light infantry, composed of a battalion of picked men taken from each of the following States: North Carolina, Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and Massachusetts; each battalion being under the command of a field officer. As already stated, Hardy Murfree was selected to command the North Carolina battalion. General Anthony Wayne was placed in command of the whole body, and to this corps of choice troops was committed the daring enterprise of storming Stony Point. Major Murfree, with his command, took his position according to his orders in front of the enemy's lines. He opened a rapid and continuous fire, for the purpose of drawing the attention of the garrison to his command, while the storming columns moved steadily and silently on his right and left to the attack on the fort. The result is matter of familiar history.

In the next year it appears that Major Murfree and his command had been transferred to the South. In his note book, which is now in the possession of a member of the family, there is an order by General Jethro Sumner, dated Warren County, June, 1780, addressed to Major Hardy Murfree, and also a copy of a letter from General Sumner, dated Hillsboro, May 18, 1781, addressed to "Col. Lamb or Maj. Murfree," relating to the movement of troops.

It may here be remarked that, in addition to the historical and documentary data, there are many interesting traditions concerning Hardy Murfree and his comrades, during the time of his service in the Continental army. It is said that in the battle of Germantown, October 4, 1777, he assisted in bearing from the field General Francis Nash,* who was mortally wounded. Colonel Murfree's sash was used upon this occasion to support the wounded General, and still bears the stains of his blood.

There are persons now living who were told by those who knew him well, his brother-in-law and son-in-law, that before the war closed Major Murfree was promoted to the rank of Colonel. He has always been accorded that title.

Colonel Murfree was married on the 17th of February, 1780, to Miss Sally Brickell, daughter of Matthias Brickell and his wife, Rachel Noailles Brickell. Mr. Brickell was a member of the Provincial Congress of North Carolina in 1776.

After the close of the war Colonel Murfree devoted himself to his private affairs. Elkanah Watson, in his book of travels in the South, published soon after the war, speaks of him as an "intrepid officer of the Revolution," whom he found busy with his plantation, on the banks of the Meherrin River, near the town of Murfreesboro, North Carolina. The town of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, was named in honor of him.

Colonel Murfree's wife died on the 29th of March, 1802, and five years afterwards he migrated to Tennessee, where he owned large bodies of land. He settled on Murfree's Fork of West Harpeth, in Williamson County, and on the 6th of July, 1809, he died. Although he had so recently identified himself with the people of Tennessee he had made many friends, and his funeral was attended by a large concourse of people. He was interred with Masonic honors, and an oration was delivered upon the occasion by Felix Grundy.

The following account of his funeral is taken from the

*The Gen. Francis Nash, who fell at the battle of Germantown in 1777, was the man in whose honor Nashville was named.

Democratic Clarion, published by Thomas G. Bradford, in Nashville, Tenn., July 21, 1809. This old newspaper is now in the possession of Mrs. Mary M. Hardeman, a granddaughter of Colonel Murfree:

On Sunday, the 9th instant, agreeable to notice, the Masonic funeral of Col. Hardy Murfree was celebrated. At 9 o'clock the procession formed in Franklin, in the following order:

Masonic Lodges, preceded by Tilers with drawn swords.

Philanthropic Lodge, Col. Edward Hard, Master, followed by the members.

Franklin Lodge, Col. N. Patterson, Master. Members.

Nashville Corps of Volunteer Cavalry, Capt. Heussar.

On the procession arriving at the gate of the garden the Philanthropic Lodge stopped, and the Franklin Lodge advanced first to the grave. At the conclusion of the Masonic funeral rites the subjoined oration was delivered by Felix Grundy, Esq., after which the military advanced and fired three volleys over the grave.

The surrounding hills were covered with vast numbers of people, and the awful silence which pervaded such an immense crowd evinced the feelings of the spectators for the memory and virtues of the deceased. Col. Murfree was said to be nearly the last survivor who commanded a regiment during the Revolutionary war. The heroes and sages of that day are rapidly passing off the stage of life, but a few years more and nothing will remain but the remembrance of the virtues of the gallant patriots who established the freedom and independence of their country.

The following are extracts from the oration delivered upon the occasion by Judge Felix Grundy:

". . . Masons have lost a brother, soldiers have lost a hero, the world has lost a citizen and a man worthy to be remembered—ye military men, he was also your brother in arms. When the voice of an injured country called him to her relief, he paused not, he left his peaceful habitation, he marched to the tented field—he felt the injustice and indignity that were offered to his country—while timid, irresolute minds were considering whether submission or resistance to the unjust demands of the old government should be preferred, in his mind there was no conflict, he saw there was but one course honorable for his country, that he adopted and pursued it—although the prospect was gloomy and unpromising he did not hesitate—he staked his property and life on the event of the doubtful contest. When in the field he was no idle spectator of the events—the plains of Monmouth bear testimony to his valor and intrepidity. In the attack on Stony Point he held a distinguished and dangerous command. On both occasions and many others he taught bravery to his soldiers by example; he never shunned danger, his gallant soul was a stranger to fear. You, ye aged men, who also partook in the dangers and difficulties of our country, know that although he was the greatest advocate for discipline, he had the talent of enforcing it rather by persuasion and example than coercion—those under his command considered his displeasure as the greatest punishment that could be inflicted on them—military men, remember his name and imitate his virtues.

"Let all present revere his memory, who, with his compatriots, brought liberty and independence to our country. We are now floating on the surface of a smooth sea, they buffeted the storm; we now enjoy the cool and refreshing breezes of peace; the scorching heat of the summer sun and the battle's danger was theirs. . . .

"Enough of our brother's character has been portrayed in the rough field of peril and danger; let us trace him in the private walks of life, where peaceful virtue, with her associates, delight to dwell. His presence, which was a terror to the enemies of his country, to his family and friends was a refreshing shower. The implements of war being laid aside, he was the affectionate husband and the tender father. He has left no consort behind him to mourn his death—his children are with us. Often will they revisit this spot, they will view it as holy ground, consecrated by the remains of their father.

"Of the benevolence of our deceased friend all who knew him can speak! With a liberal but unostentatious hand, he relieved the wants of the distressed. With those feelings which masonry inspires, he fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and dried up the tear upon the widow's cheek."

Colonel Murfree left two sons and five daughters, all of whom were married. None of them are now living; the second generation has passed away, but the third and fourth are numerous. A large proportion of his descendants are residents of Tennessee, a few of Mississippi, some live in Kentucky, and some in Missouri.

Colonel Murfree's letters and memoranda show that he was a finely educated man, and of great native intelligence. He was of a generous and enthusiastic temperament, and was endowed with many noble traits of character. He was in every respect an honorable and upright man, a gallant officer, greatly beloved in private life, and most exemplary in his domestic relations. His private character is one which adds lustre to his public services.

In Memoriam

Entered into the eternal joy of her Lord on January 10, 1918, Mary Armistead Moore Matthew, the beloved wife of Patrick Matthew, formerly of Scotland, now of Edenton, North Carolina, daughter of the late Mrs. Susan Augustus Moore Righton, and niece of Miss M. E. Moore, of Edenton.

Descended from a long line of brilliant and distinguished ancestors, the noblest qualities of her antecedents culminated and found expression in her rare and charming personality. She used the gifts with which she was so richly endowed for the glory of God and the good of her fellow-man.

Her mind was as keen as a rapier, but possessed a depth a statesman might envy. She was a leader in all the educational, charitable, civic and church activities and an inspiration to the community in which she went about doing good.

She was a faithful, devoted member of St. Paul's Episcopal church, and filled with honor and efficiency the offices of president of the Bell Battery Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, and regent of Penelope Barker Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, and was a member of the North Carolina Society of Colonial Dames.

The historical tablets erected in Edenton are a memorial to her, and mark her interest and love for her native town.

With sincere grief we join the procession of the sorrowing in the loss of one who was dear to us. Her memory will be cherished in the hearts of all that knew her, for her broad sympathy and tender, loving nature responded readily to the joys and sorrows of others, and she made life a sweeter, fairer thing for all with whom she came in contact.

DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON WALES.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT TO MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW.

Realizing the Society of the Daughters of the Revolution has sustained an irreparable loss in the death of our beloved member, Mrs. Patrick Matthew, for ten years Regent of the Penelope Barker Chapter, the following resolutions have been adopted:

1. Since it has pleased God in His wisdom to call to higher service our friend and useful member, Mrs. Matthew, with a deep sense of our loss, we wish to express to her husband, Mr. Patrick Matthew, and her aunt, Miss Mary E. Moore, our tender and sincere sympathy.

2. That we mourn the loss of a brilliant and stimulating presence among us. May we press forward with renewed energy in the work she loved so well. The memorials she was instrumental in erecting in and around Edenton, are of great value to the State and to coming generations. Edenton, so rich in historical association and great deeds, was to her a trust, to revive and keep in the hearts of the living, and well did she fill her trust.

3. That she was faithful in all the relations of life, and the State has lost one of the most active and patriotic women.

4. That while her vacant place fills our hearts with sadness, we humbly submit to the will of God.

5. A copy of these resolutions be sent to her family and that they be entered into the minutes of the Society of the Daughters of the Revolution and the Edenton papers please copy.

Respectfully,

MRS. MARSHALL WILLIAMS,
State Regent.

Biographical Sketch

By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

MISS MILDRED LEWIS RUTHERFORD

Miss Rutherford contributes an article on the "Civilization of the Old South" in this issue of The Booklet, and which we hope will be reproduced in widely circulated journals.

Miss Rutherford was born at Athens, Ga., July 16, 1851. She is a daughter of William and Laura Battaille (Cobb) Rutherford, of Athens. North Carolina is one of her ancestral states. Her ancestors, the Lewises and Cobbs, lived in Granville County; she descends from the Lewises of Warner Hall and many of the distinguished families of the Old Dominion. Her great grandfathers, Col. John Rutherford and Major Francis Boykin, were with Gen. Nathaniel Greene in the American Revolution.

Miss Rutherford was educated at the Lucy Cobb Institute of Athens and subsequently its president for seventeen years. Again in 1917 she is president of Lucy Cobb. She is an inveterate reader and is trying hard to right the wrongs of history. Her studies cover every phase of literature and language and from her many activities is known nationally as educator, author, and historian. She is an educator of ability, as attested by her long service as president of that great Georgia institution, The Lucy Cobb. As an author her work includes many books and addresses. One of notable importance, "The Thirteen Periods of United States History," much used in schools and well deserves to become a text-book in all the States of the Union. This compilation is authoritative, reliable, and without sectionalism.

Miss Rutherford is State Historian of the Georgia Division of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. She was Historian General of the U. D. C., 1911-'12-'13-'14-'15-'16 and resigned from this office on account of the time-limit.

Her life has been, and is, one of great mental activity, besides one of great responsibility, doing all with that energy and faithfulness characteristic of her forefathers.

She is a compiler of Southern history; and of English authors, French authors, American authors, and "The South in History and Literature." In patriotic work she is a potent factor. She is a member of the Society of Daughters of the American Revolution, to which she gives invaluable service in recording events of that period dear to the hearts of patriotic descendants. She is a member of the National Society of Colonial Dames of America in the State of Georgia, an organization that has brought to light facts in history by delving into old letters, court records, family wills and deeds, which by neglect would have been destroyed.

As a Daughter of the Confederacy and a long-time historian of that order, she has been assiduous in her researches, using every endeavor to see history made straight for the Southland. Her limited experience of that unfortunate period of our history, together with a great cloud of witnesses, she has unraveled many a tangled web of misreckoning and has woven the true threads of history into a fabric for the benefit of the future historian—and in which the South will greatly rejoice.

In this short sketch it is impossible to touch but lightly on the benefits bestowed by Miss Rutherford on her country. Her pleasing personality, added to her accomplishments of head and heart, have won for her an enviable place as a chronicler of history and a woman of high endeavor.

An address on "Historical Sins of Omission and Commission," dealing with events from 1754 to the present time, which she made at the General Convention of the U. D. C.'s at San Francisco in 1915, stands out for itself as one of abiding interest and importance. This address covers thirty-six pages and is well worthy of being reproduced on vellum, bound in morocco and placed in every library in this Nation.

With unprejudiced eyes, a sane look at things as they were, readers of the North, South, East, and West will put the stamp of justice on the brow of Miss Rutherford as an unbiased citizen and a champion of rights to all.

The Origin of the Regulation in North Carolina*

By Archibald Henderson

The Regulation has been exhaustively studied, and is still something of a cause célèbre in North Carolina history. The origin of the movement has remained veiled in an obscurity which the diligent efforts of innumerable investigators have hitherto failed to illumine. The contemporary work[1] ascribed to Hermon Husband, a leader of the Regulators, opens with the statement:

> In Orange County the first disturbance is generally ascribed to have arisen; but Granville and Halifax Counties were deeply engaged in the same quarrel many years before Orange. . . . For though Granville County had been at war, as it were, some years before the disturbance in Orange, yet we never heard of it till it broke out in Orange.

Researches made by the writer in the records of Granville County and the state archives at Raleigh have brought to light records and documents of crucial importance which have not hitherto been known to exist, or been available to historical students.

In his Impartial Relation the author, presumably Husband, quotes several passages from a manuscript, by an unknown author, generally denominated "The Nutbush paper."[2] The writer has recently discovered a contemporary copy of this address in its entirety, which has been missing for almost a century and a half. It is evidently in the handwriting of the author, George Sims, and is thus acknowledged by him, as well as bearing his signature in three places.

[1] An Impartial Relation of the First Rise and Cause of the Recent Differences in Publick Affairs, in the Province of North Carolina, printed for the Compiler (1770, pp. 104). With certain slight omissions, this work was reprinted in Wheeler's Sketches of North Carolina, II. 301-331. The collation was made from a copy in the library of the Philadelphia Library Company. There is also a copy in the John Carter Brown Library at Providence.

Of the author, who when this address was written had either been in Granville County but a short time or at least had formed but few acquaintances there, almost nothing can be stated at present. The Sims family settled in Granville probably before the time of its formation in 1746; in 1747 and 1748, entries in the county records refer to Sims's Road and Joseph Sims's ferry-landing on Tarr River. Henry Sims is first mentioned in the county records in 1747; and Joseph Sims, whose name occurs in the county records in 1746, qualified as captain of the Granville County militia on May 30, 1750. The first inspector of the first government warehouse in Granville County was Benjamin Sims, appointed August 31, 1749; other members of the family mentioned in the records are William Sims (1758), John Sims (1760), and Elisha Sims (1772). In 1777 Caswell County was set off from Orange, which had been formed in 1751 from Granville, Johnston, and Bladen counties. On the roll of taxpayers, listed in Caswell County in 1790, is found the name of George Sims, under the roll for "St. David's District."[3]

Despite the obscurity surrounding the material facts of the life of George Sims, the paper, for all its violences of prejudice and crudities in expression, is an able statement of grievances; and as an appeal to action, it indubitably exercised a powerful influence over the minds of the yeomen of Granville. It is dedicated to Captain Thomas Person, prominent figure in the Regulation movement—the one figure in that yeoman insurrection who subsequently won high place and reputation in the colony. This paper, as the first effective summing-up of the grievances of the people, was surely a proximate cause of the Regulation.

[2]The title, as given in Wheeler, is described as mutilated; it is made out to read as follows: "A serious address to the inhabitants of Granville County, containing an account of our deplorable situation we suffer . . . and some necessary hints with respect to a reformation." It is to be observed that the copy here printed, made for Capt. Thomas Person and prefaced with some observations of the author, carries the brief title: "An Address to the People of Granville County."

It has been only imperfectly realized that the Regulation remotely received its initial impetus from the bipartite division of authority in the colony of North Carolina, between the agents of Lord Granville and the royal governor. When Earl Granville in 1744 united with the other Lords Proprietors in surrendering to the crown the sovereignty of the province of Carolina, he alone reserved to himself all rights as owner of the soil, in his share of the grant. Fully one-half of the province of North Carolina was embraced in Granville's district; and those who occupied lands within this district were required to pay annual quit-rents. As early as 1755 a committee of the assembly formally reported on the abuses of Lord Granville's agent and his subordinates; but no action was taken. On January 24, 1759, following vigorous protests against injustices which remained unredressed, a number of citizens seized Francis Corbin, Granville's principal agent, bore him to Enfield, where he had an office, and held him in duress until he gave a bond. Especial hostility was expressed by the disaffected toward the attorney-general of the colony, Robert Jones, jr., who was also a personal favorite of Earl Granville.[4] In his Impartial Relation, Husband says that when the "Nutbush paper" was circulated at a meeting of the Orange County court, August, 1767, "after we had tried to plead our own cause at the bar against extortion," "some persons who lived adjoining Granville line told us they feared that matter would ruin some of us, for that just such a case had been undertook in Granville County years ago, and that they were at law about it to that day".

Jones, called Robin, settled in Granville County as early as 1748, and during the years 1756 to 1766 served as attorney-general of the colony, alternating with Thomas Child. He was the father of Willie and Allen Jones, famous in the annals of the State. Cf., for example, Life of John Paul Jones, vol. I., by Mrs. Reginald De Koven (New York, 1913).

The original petition by sundry of the inhabitants of Granville County, of date March 23, 1759, protests bitterly against the practice of Robert Jones, jr., in demanding exorbitant fees for his legal services, etc., and asks that he be prohibited from pleading at the Granville bar. This petition, hitherto unpublished it is believed, constitutes a fundamental document in the written history of the Regulation. The copy here presented, collated from the original records, was kindly supplied me by Dr. Thomas M. Owen, of Montgomery, director of the Department of Archives and History of Alabama. This Searcy petition was read at a meeting of the Granville County court, in the presence of the justices William Person, Daniel Harris, Gideon Macon, Thomas Person, and William Hunt. The presence of Thomas Person on the bench is to be noted. In his Impartial Relation, Husband says that as a result of the petition, the officers sued the subscribers for a libel, indicted the author of the paper, and imprisoned him; "which lawsuits have remained to this day" (1769). It is impossible to authenticate these statements, as the third volume of the Granville County Records, for 1759-1767, has disappeared. Below follows the petition of Reuben Searcy and others; Searcy was a prominent citizen of the county, sheriff in 1763, and afterwards clerk of the county court (1771-1783). The effect of the Searcy petition is clearly perceptible; for on May 14, 1759, Robert Jones testified under oath before the governor and council that "he had heard it was intended by a great number of rioters to petition the court at Granville to silence him, the deponent, and that if no such order was made, to pull deponent by the nose and also to abuse the court." Following a formal address to the governor by the assembly on May 15, a proclamation was issued and reputed rioters were incarcerated; but the jail was immediately broken open and the prisoners set free. Corbin's legal actions against the rioters were prudently withdrawn, and the issues temporarily settled. The rioters lived in the counties, not only of the present Granville and Halifax, but also of Vance, Warren, Edgecombe, Wilson, Nash, and Franklin. The riot at Enfield presages the breaking-up of the court at Hillsborough in 1770; the petition of Searcy is the natural precursor of the Nutbush paper of George Sims.

As the rioters at Enfield protested against the illegal practices of Corbin, and the commoners of Granville in the Searcy petition protested against the exorbitant fees of Jones, so George Sims appeals to the inhabitants of Granville to rise against the tyrannies and exactions of Benton. The taking of extortionate fees constituted the primary and fundamental grievance of the people; but in connection with the protests against Jones, it may be mentioned that the closure of Granville's office in 1765 was on all hands cited to Governor Josiah Martin in 1771 as a chief cause of the Regulator troubles.[5] When the people moved on to these lands, after 1765, conflicts with the colonial authorities as the result of the refusal of the people to pay taxes were inevitable.

I. THE PETITION OF REUBEN SEARCY AND OTHERS, MARCH 23, 1759

To the Worshipful Court of Granville County Greeting. The Petition of Sundry of the Inhabitants of the County aforesaid. We his Majesties true and faithful subjects humbly beg leave to shew your worships that notwithstanding the many Liberties Rights and Privileges granted us by his Majesty King George the Second etc. whose subjects we are and whose person Crown and dignity we are ready and willing now and at all other times to defend and do with the greatest sincerity profess true obedience and loyalty, but Liberty that dearest of names and Property that best of charters, seems to be too much detracted, as we verily believe by the illusive insinuations of Mr. Robert Jones Jr. Therefore your Petrs. humbly pray your worships to take the same into your wise and deliberate considerations and as far as in your powers lie, redress and relieve your Petrs. with many others from his unjust impositions and exorbitancy. Therefore to proceed in the first place that eloquent Gentleman through his wiles and false insinuations to which art and chicanerie he owes his great success and high preferment in this Province that we your petitioners verily believe has not only impos'd on the inferior class of mankind

[5] N. C. Col. Rec., IX, 49. Cf. Bassett, "The Regulators of North Carolina (1765-1771)," in Annual Report, American Historical Association, 1894, p. 150, note. but has likewise impos'd on his Excellency Arthur Dobbs Esqre.[6] Governor etc., of this Province together with his Majesties' Honourable Council that notwithstanding their wise and mature considerations together with their just honest and righteous intentions for the benefit and welfare of the inhabitants of this our Province in general, yet that gentleman thro' false and unjust Representations in matters relating to our County of Granville hath prevailed on his Excellency and Honours aforesd to issue a Commission of Peace for our said County thereby leaving out of said Commission several worthy gentlemen that were very serviceable and beneficial to our said County and more especially to the upper inhabitants thereof for the lack of which magistrates or a sufficient number of such your petitioners labour under great disadvantages and inconveniences and also Justice likely to be much retarded which certainly is very disagreeable to your worships as well as petitioners. And furthermore the Legislature of the Province have in their wise and deliberate consideration allowed and stated a set fee very sufficient for an Attorney practiseing in our said Province to have and receive for his care and trouble in prosecuting Suits in any of our Courts of Judicature but Mr. Jones instead of the fee allow'd by law frequently demands and receives double that fee without any matter or remorse of conscience, so that it has become a general practice and custom among chief of our Attornies, and by the great volubility of speech and the superiority that he by his wiles insinuations and chicanerie as aforesd. has insinuated himself into, very frequently works on the passions of weak juries to blind their conception of Justice in order to gain his point so that men flock daily to him to comence very trivial and frivolous lawsuits which tends to the great disadvantage and prejudice of our inhabitants for all which insults and injuries your petitioners humbly beg your worships to exclude and prohibit the sd Mr. Jones from pleading at our barr for the future and your petitioners as in duty bound shall ever pray.

[6]Arthur Dobbs, a native of Ireland, was appointed governor of North Carolina by the crown and took the oath of office on November 1, 1754. In connection with the Enfield riots, Governor Dobbs was popularly credited with showing a friendly disposition toward the rioters. Upon his death at the age of eighty-two, on March 28, 1765, he was succeeded as governor by William Tryon, who proved singularly unsympathetic with the regulating element in respect to their alleged grievances.

G. SIMS.
TO CAPT. THOS. PERSON.

Sir.

The honour you do me by requesting a copy of my address to the inhabitants of Granville County does not raise my vanity to such a height; but what I am mortified down to the lowest degree imaginable, at the thoughts of granting your request. Not, because it contains any thing, either false, or criminal. I wish from my heart the facts therein related were not so notorious as they are: But the mortifying reflection is this, I wrote it for the common people to understand, and therefore took not the pains to be methodical, as I should have done, if I had known, or imagined, it would ever have come within the Scrutiny of Gentlemen. I do not intend by this Sir, to insinuate that I could write so methodically, as to stand the test of a critic, or in other words to commence author. Were I to entertain such a vain conceit, I should be afraid the very trees in the forest, rocks, hills, and vallies, would all resound the echo of that vain thought to my eternal shame and confusion. But, forasmuch as the facts treated of, whether generally, or particularly, are so notorious, and the conclusions so natural, that, it is no hard matter for me to compose a subject of this nature methodically enough to bear at least a perusal among Gentlemen, who are acquainted with my Circumstances. Because where nothing extraordinary can reasonably be expected, no great disappointment can happen, if nothing extraordinary be found. However, as I had not the presence of mind to make these reflections before it was too late, I gave you my promise, from which I cannot now in honour recind, therefore, I have this request to make, which I hope you will be candid enough to comply with; I do imagine, that you will communicate it to Gentlemen of penetration, and as I am positive, that, it will not bear criticising on; either in the orthographical, or grammatical perfections, I insist, that, at your leisure, you would correct those deficiencies, which are too egregious to bear the sight of a Critic at ten yards distance, that is if you intend to shew it to any Gentleman, who has not yet seen it. Otherwise, I do not care, since you are acquainted with the Author, [9]Known in history as General Thomas Person; born January 19, 1733, died November 16, 1800. Began life as surveyor for Lord Granville; sheriff of Granville County (1762), justice of the peace (1759, 1763, 1764), representative in assembly for Granville, 1764, 1768-1785 continuously, 1788-1790, 1793-1794; senator in assembly 1787, 1791; elected (May 11, 1784) to Continental Congress, but never took his seat. The most vigorous democrat and vehement champion of the rights of the common people; leading Regulator and able adviser in their cause; included by Gov. Tryon in the list of those excepted from the benefit of pardon; captured and imprisoned; secured his release and was never brought to trial. Cf. sketches: S. B. Weeks, in *N. C. you will easily look over the imperfections of the performance without censure: Since you cannot expect any accurate performance from so small abilities, which, however small, the person who is endowed with them, is proud of nothing more, than the honour of subscribing himself your very hble Servt. G. SIMS.

N. B. I imagine it may be a matter of mirth to some Gentlemen to see my writing appear in the method of an Author, having a dedication prefixt. However let such remember, that as to the subject, I write the truth, and as to form, I write in my own Style.

I am yrs. etc. G. SIMS.

Gentlemen, You are chiefly strangers to me, there are very few of you, that I am personally acquainted with, and I imagine that some of you begin to wonder, what I am going to offer to a company of men that I know nothing of. However, Gentlemen, when I consider myself as a member of Granville County, I am no longer a stranger among you, but a brother of that community to which you all belong, and as such, I look upon it as my indispensible duty, to exert myself in vindication of those rights and privileges which our Constitution has endowed us with, when either persons or things endeavour to destroy them, and as this is evidently the case at this present juncture, I think it is high time we should all exert ourselves, in our defence against the common evil, which has almost overrun our land, and this is the motive Gentlemen, which induced me to desire a convention, and an audience of you, that I may lay before you, those grievances which oppress our land. Not, because you do not know it Gentlemen; but, because you do, and that by knowing it, you may the more chearfully join with me, in such methods as I shall propose, for the recovery of our native rights and privileges and to clear our country of those public nuisances which predominate with such tyrannical sway. And, I hope to see you all unanimously zealous and combine as one man to throw off the heavy yoke, which is cast upon our necks, and resume our ancient liberties and privileges, as free subjects. Who under God are governed by his august Majesty George the third, whom God preserve. And in order to explain myself on this subject, I shall undertake 1st. To explain what law is, when abstractedly considered. 2ndly. The utility or use of every human negative, and positive law. 3rdly. I shall undertake to shew the most notorious and intolerable abuses, which have crept into the practice of the law in this Country. 4thly. The mischief which necesarrily flows from, or follows the abuse of the law, and the absolute necessity there is for a reformation. 5thly. Propound such methods to effect this reformation as appears to me most probable of success. And, Lastly, I shall recommend the whole to your serious consideration, and insist that we be no longer strangers when the common evil, which we groan under, calls so loudly for our interposition. Therefore let us unite as brothers of one community, to recover our privileges, which are trampled under foot, by a handful of wretches, who are fitter for halters than Officers [10] of a Court. In the first place it is no hard matter to explain what law is; neither is it very material to my purpose whether I explain it or not; but as I promised to do it, and, because it may in some sort give us an idea of laws in general, and their obliging power; I shall explain it in the words of the learned Mr. Dawson,[11] who in his treatise of the origin of law, Says, That law is the rule of acting, or not acting, laid down by some intelligent being, having authority for so doing. This, Gentlemen, though it is short, yet it is a comprehensive description of all laws, whether divine or human, whether natural or revealed, negative or positive. And, without entering into definitions of particular laws, or tedious observations on the nature and property of Laws, I shall descend to the second proposal which was to shew the general utility or use of laws. And I may venture to affirm that the laws of all well regulated Societies will aptly fall under one of these three general heads or divisions. 1st. To secure men's persons from death and violence. 2ndly. To dispose of the property of their goods and lands. And 3rdly. For the preservation of their good names from shame and infamy. Under one of these three general heads, I say the laws of all well regulated societies will aptly fall; The further any system of law deviates from these great and general ends, the nearer it approaches to those systems of law, which are the productions of despotism and tyranny. But we are the people Gentlemen, who have the happiness of being born under one of the most perfect forms of government in the known world. We are a part of that stupendous

[10] Foot-note in original manuscript: "Let it be remembered that whenever I mention Officers of the Court (which is a summary comprehension of the ministers of Justice if largely taken) I mean no more than, Clerks, Lawyers, and Sheriffs, and not the Wpl. members of the Bench, whose authority I revere, and hold them in the highest veneration."

The particular objects of the distrust of the inhabitants of Granville County were Robert Jones, attorney-general of the colony and agent of Lord Granville; and Samuel Benton, colonel of the Granville County militia, and clerk of the county court; but other county officers and lawyers generally were complained against. There are certain conspicuous exceptions to those in bad odor with the disaffected. Among the "worshipful members of the bench" (justices of the county court) during the period referred to, who, in the language of Sims, were "revered" and "held in the highest veneration," were Thomas Person, Reuben Searcy, Gideon Macon, and Richard Henderson. For Thomas Person, cf. note 9 supra. Reuben Searcy was the author of the trenchant protest against Robert Jones, jr. Gideon Macon, an emigrant from Virginia, was the father of the democratic statesman, Nathaniel Macon, the friend and intimate of Jefferson. Richard Henderson was a young attorney whose "amazing talents and general praise had not created him a single enemy"; in appointing him to the highest court in the colony, the governor in a letter to the Earl of Shelburne said of him that he lived among a people who "will be happy at having such a distinction paid to one who resides among them, and for whom they entertain an esteem." (N. C. Col. Rec., VII. 697). Later, protests were made in both Orange and Granville against sheriffs who were grossly in arrears in their accounts. Conspicuous exceptions were Thomas Hart, who, as sheriff of Orange, was proved to have been "not a farthing out in his accounts" (N. C. Col. Rec., VIII, 233); and Samuel Henderson, sheriff of Granville, to whom, upon examination of his accounts, the county was found to be in arrears and the account was allowed (Granville County Records, June 19, 1759).

whole, which constitutes the glorious, and formidable kingdom of Great Britain. The Sceptre of which is swayed by his present Majesty, George the third, of the royal house of Hanover, and right heir to the crown, and royal dignity, according to a Protestant succession, settled by an act of parliament in the reign of Queen Ann of blessed Memory. We are the subjects, I say, of this august monarch, who in conjunction with the united power and authority of the Lords spiritual, Lords temporal, and house of Commons, maintain and uphold this inimitable System of law, which his royal ancestors, and their predecessors, have from time to time enacted, and established for the safety of his kingdom, and the benefit of his leige subjects, by securing our person from death and violence: By disposing of the property of our goods and lands, and by providing methods for the preservation of our good names from shame and infamy. All these privileges, Gentlemen, we dare to call our own, under the protection of that (almost) immutable system of law, which is confirmed by the triple combined authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, as you have heard before and transferred by them to all his Majesty's plantations in North America, and else where as a model to form their laws by, and as a touchstone to try the validity of such laws, as shall be enacted by any Legislative power, within his Majesty's extensive Dominions.

This, Gentlemen, is the inexhaustible fountain, the source whence we draw our claims to these privileges that our situation as free subjects undoubtedly entitles us to, And that we may be provided with such laws, as the particular circumstance of our province, may from time to time require.

We have an assembly, which somewhat resembles that grand tripartite conjunction of the King's authority, Lords, and Commons. Here we have a Governor, Council, and an Assembly of Representatives chosen by the populous [12] to enact laws for the benefit of the Commonwealth, as occasion may require in conformity to the laws aforesaid. And I suppose, they have answered those ends, or whether they have, or have not, is a matter, which I shall not now undertake to determine. However, we have a set of laws peculiar to this Province, for a System I cannot call them, because they are mostly temporary and subject to change.

There is none that I know of, if they were honestly complied with, that would not answer the end intended by our great Legislature at home; except, it be some petit private acts in favour of some particular persons, who by false insinuations and sinister practices have obtained the same, which, I shall treat of in their proper places. Well, Gentlemen, it is not our mode, or form of Government, nor yet the body of our laws, that we are quarrelling with, but with the malpractices of the Officers of our County Court, and the abuses which we suffer by those empowered to manage our public affairs; this is the grievance, Gentlemen, which demands our solemn attention, and in order to make it evident, I shall according to my promise in the third place shew the notorious and intolerable abuses which have crept into the practice of the law in this county, (and I do not doubt in the other counties also, though that does not concern us). In the first place, it is well known, that there is a law which provides that a lawyer shall take no more than 15/ for his fee in the County Court. Well, Genl. which of you have had your business done for 15/ ? Do not the Lawyers exact 30s for every cause, and 3, 4, or 5 pounds for every cause that is attended with the least difficulty? Yes; they do Gentlemen, and laugh at our stupidity and tame submission to these damned extravagancies. And besides the double fees, which they exact from you, do they not lengthen out your lawsuits, by artificies and delays, so long as they perceive you have any money to grease their fists with? And numberless other devilish devices to rob you of your livings in a manner diametrically opposite to the policy of our State, and the intention of our Legislature. I dare engage for you all, Gentlemen in the affirmative, I believe there is none here at present, but what must acknowledge that this is exactly the Case. Well, Gentlemen, if there were no more public evils, this, alone is sufficient [in] a little while to ruin our County in these litigious times. But hear another evil greater by far, if possible. Mr. Benton[13] in his former, and in his present capacity, is a subject worth a particular scrutiny. View him but in his former, and then view him in his present capacity, and make an estimate of the service he has done you, in requital for the favour you did him by taking him out of prison or what was next door to it, and sending him Burgess. He was universally esteemed a person calculated for what is called a poor mans Burgess, and indeed he has proved a poor mans Burgess, he forgot that you sent him to do your business, Gentlemen, his mind (like his eyes) is turned inward, and all his transactions below have been for the benefit of that dear self of his, which is so much in his own good graces, that he is plundering his County to enrich that dear object! You had a great deal of reason, I acknowledge, Gentlemen, [13]First heard of in Granville County, N. C., on January 2, 1752, when he produced his commission as justice of the peace. On July 6, 1756, he was in prison and refused to serve when appointed justice of the peace (N. C. Col. Rec., V. 591); acted as justice of the county court in the years 1752-1755, 1763, 1764, and perhaps at other times; colonel Granville County militia, 1765; clerk of the court from 1765 until the time of his death shortly prior to April 17, 1770; representative in the general Assembly from Granville County in 1760, 1761, 1762 (April and November), 1764-1765, 1766-1768. The Granville County Records show him to have been prominent and active in county affairs, notably as commissioner for the erection of a court house, gaol, stocks, and whipping-post. At various times he presented bills for his services against the county, running up into hundreds of pounds. He was the grandfather of Thomas Hart Benton, the famous statesman, who was born (March 14, 1782) near Hillsborough, on the old road to Haw River, about half a mile from the river Enoe, where stood the mill of Thomas Hart. Samuel Benton's son, Jesse, the father of Thomas Hart Benton, was a representative in the assembly in 1781, lieutenant-colonel of militia, and accompanied Judge Richard Henderson on his journey over the Wilderness Road to Kentucky in 1775. Cf. the erroneous account of Thomas Hart Benton's forbears in the biography by W. M. Meigs (Philadelphia, 1904).

to imagine that a person who had suffered by the malpractices of others would make a benevolent patriot, when in a public capacity; but how much have probabilities deceived you; judge ye!

He is Colo. Benton, now chief Officer in our military affairs, he is Clerk Benton, chief Clerk of our County Court, in which double capacity I believe, Gentlemen, there is None [of] us that envies him, but in the execution of his office. I beleive there are none of us that have the good of the Commonwealth at heart, but must resent the usage he gives us here. The Clerks tell us their is no law to ascertain their fees, and therefore they are at liberty to tax our bills as they please, and the misfortune is Gentlemen, that we are obliged to pay it, be it what it may; I think, Gentlemen, if there be no law to ascertain the Clerk's fees, there is no law to compel us to pay any fees at all. However, let us see what advantage Benton the poor mans Burgess makes of this deficiency in our law, if you give a judgment Bond for five pounds only, and this Bond goes into Court, the Clerk for only entering it on the Court docquet and issuing an Execution, charges you with forty one shillings and five pence, I had it from Benton's own mouth, at which time he vapoured as high, and with the same confidence that a fighting gamester has, who is endowed with courage of a highwayman, with oaths and execrations that he had taken it and would take it.

However, Gentlemen, I hope you will disappoint him, I am determined till he produces law that shews me what the fees are, to pay no fees at all, and I hope you will all follow the example, and see where Benton will get his obliging power to compel us to pay them. All these abuses are founded upon so false a basis, that [the] least resistance will overturn the whole mass. For, where there is no law, there is no transgression in not complying with the arbitrary demands of a lawless Officer, and where the law gives a right, the same law will give a remedy, when this law is violated, and that our rights and privileges are violated in the highest degree is manifest, not only from what has been said, but from the daily practices of our Officer. It is time, and high time, Gentlemen, that we should endeavour to save our sinking County from the impending ruin, which will be the necessary consequence of these cursed practices. I told you Gentlemen, I would undertake to sum up the abuses, which have crept into the practice of the law in this County. I have indeed undertaken it, but if my paper would permit, I am positive your patience would not. To say all that might be said on this subject alone would fill a large volume; therefore, I must abridge the catelogue, that I may perform my promise in other particulars; but remember by the way, the hardships that we suffer by building the courthouse etc. for Benton to bring grist to his own mill: But I shall treat of this subject with an instrument prepared to regulate this hardship.

And therefore I shall proceed to the 4th proposal, which was to shew the mischief that naturally flows as a consequence from these cursed practices, and whatever I say Gentlemen, to illustrate this melancholy subject. Need I mention one instance to set forth the misery which we groan under? Does not daily experience shew us the gaping jaws of ruin, open, and ready to devour us? Are not your lands executed, your negroes, horses, cattle, hogs, corn, beds, and household furniture? Are not these things, I say, taken and sold for one tenth of their value? Not to satisfy the just debts which you have contracted; but to satisfy the cursed exorbitant demands of the Clerks, Lawyers and Sheriffs. Here they take your lands which perhaps are worth four or five hundred pounds, and sell them at public vendue for about forty or fifty pounds. And who buys? Why the same villians who have taken your negroes and other personal estate, and have the County's money in their hands. This has furnished them with money to buy off the rest of your livings, at the same rates as you have heard. It is reasonable Gentlemen, that these Officers should be allowed such fees, as may give them a genteel maintenance, but then is it reasonable that they should rob the County to support themselves in such damned extravagancies, and laugh at us for being such simpletons as to suffer it? No: Gentlemen, there is no reason that I know of; except they want to reduce us down to that despicable state whence they rose, and a pitiful estate it was, Gentlemen. There were none of our arbitrary Governors, whose descent were not as obscure, and dispicable, as their transactions in a public capacity have been base and illegal. But it is a received maxim among the unhappy subjects of electorial Dominions, that they have the most to fear from a King who hops from the dunghill to the throne. But to return from my disagreeable digression, let us make an estimate of the difference between getting our livings by honest industry and getting them by these cursed practices. We will suppose ourselves all to be men, who labour for our livings, and there is a poor man among us, who has dealt for about 4 or 5 pounds in such things as his family could not possibly do without, and in hopes of being spared from the lash of the law till he can sell some of his effects to raise the money; he gives a judgment bond to his Merchant, and before he can accomplish his design his bond is thrown into Court, and Benton the poor mans Burgess has it to enter on the Court docquet and issue an execution the work of one long minute. Well, Gentlemen, what has our poor neighbor to pay Mr. Benton for his trouble? Why, nothing but the trifling sum of forty-one shillings and five pence. Well he is a poor man, and cannot raise the money. We will suppose Mr. Benton condescends to come to terms with him. Come (says he) and work. I have a large field and my corn wants weeding (or something like that). I will give you 1/6 a day, which is the common wages of a labourer in these times till you pay it off because you are a poor man, and a neighbour I will not take away your living. Well how many days work has our honest neighbor to pay Mr. Benton for his trouble and expense in writing about a minute? Why, he must work something more than 27 days before he is clear of his clutches. Well the poor man reflects within himself. At this rate says he when shall I maintain my own family. I have a wife and a parcel of small children suffering at home and I have none to labour but myself, and here I have lost a month's work and I do not know for what, my merchant not yet paid, I do not know what will be the end of these things; however, I will go home, and try what I can do towards getting a living. Stay neighbour, you must not go home, you are not half done yet, there is a damned Lawyers mouth to stop before you go any further, you impowered him to confess that you owed £5., and you must pay him 30/ for that, or, else go and work nineteen days for that pick-pocket at the same rate, and when that is done, you must work as many days for the Sheriff, for his trouble, and then go home and see your living wrecked and tore to pieces to satisfy your merchant.

Well Gentlemen, if this were the case, would it not be a melancholy thing? But it is worse by ten degrees than anything that you have yet heard. It is not a persons labour, nor yet his effects that will do, but if he has but one horse to plow with, one bed to lie on, or one cow to give a little milk for his children, they must all go to raise money which is not to be had. And lastly if his personal estate (sold at one tenth of its value)' will not do, then his lands (which perhaps has cost him many years toil and labour) must go the same way to satisfy these cursed hungry caterpillars, that are eating and will eat out the bowels of our Commonwealth, if they be not pulled down from their nests in a very short time, and what need I say, Gentlemen, to urge the necessity there is for a reformation. If these things were absolutely according to law, it would be enough to make us turn rebels, and throw off all submission to such tyrannical laws. For, if these things were tolerated, it would rob us of the very means of living, and it would be better for us to die in defence of our privileges, than to live slaves to a handful of Scapegallows, or perish for want of the means of subsistance. But, as these practices are diametrically opposite to the law, it is our absolute duty, as well as our Interest, to put a stop to them, before they quite ruin our County. Or, Are become the willing slaves of these lawless Officers, and hug our chains of bondage, and remain contented under these accumulated calamities? No, Gentlemen, I hope better things of you. I believe there are very few of you, who have not felt the weight of their Iron fists and I hope there are none of you, but what will lend a helping hand towards bringing about this necessary work. And in order to bring it about effectually, we must proceed with circumspection, not fearfully, Gentlemen, but carefully, and therefore, it will be necessary to mention certain rules to be observed in our proceedings. And first, let us be careful to keep sober, that we do nothing rashly; but act with deliberation. Secondly, Let us do nothing against the known and established laws of our land, that we may not appear as a faction endeavouring to subvert the laws, and overturn our system of government. But, let us appear what we really are, To wit, free subjects by birth, endeavouring to recover our native rights according to law, and to reduce the malpractices of the Officers of our Court down to the standard of law. For, we must remember that it is not the Body of our laws, we are fighting with, this would be the highest folly, since it is the known established law of our land, that is a bulwark to defend those privileges, which we are contending for, except there be any late private acts, that favour them in these devilish practices, if there be any such law, I say, Gentlemen, it deviates from the use of the law, which I cited to you in the beginning and consequently derogatory from the System of the laws of England, and so we are bound by no authority to submit to them, but there are no such laws that I know of. Thirdly, Let us behave ourselves with circumspection to the Worshipful Court inasmuch as they represent his Majesty's person, we ought to reverence their authority both sacred, and inviolable, except they interpose, and then Gentlemen, the toughest will hold out longest. Let us deliver them a remonstrance, setting forth the necessity there is for a suspension of court business, till we have a return from the Governor, in answer to the petition, which we shall send to his Excellency on the occasion. The remonstrance to their Worships, and the petition to his Excellency I have ready drawn, which I shall communicate to you after I have made my last proposal, which is this, I promised that the last paragraph should be a recommendation of the whole to your serious consideration, and insist upon some points necessary to be concluded on; but as all that has been said is so self evident, and the matter so important, that I am in hopes, you have all considered the subject, and made such conclusions as may inspire a resentment against the abuses which we suffer, therefore, my proposal is this, I am a stranger, I say to the chief of you. I have not moved in these matters out of any vain ostentation, or any private pique that I have against any of our arbitrary Governors, but a true zeal for the good of my County, was the only motive, which induced me; neither do I desire the preeminence in any thing among you, I am a stranger, I say, therefore it may be, that you have not that confidence in me, which you can repose in some of your acquaintances whose resolution you know will answer the end of these undertakings. If so Gentlemen, name the man, I will be the first on his list to follow him through fire and water, life and death if it be required in defence of my privileges, and if you choose me for your leader I can do no more. Here I am this day with my life in my hand, to see my fellow subjects animated with a spirit of liberty and freedom, and to see them lay a foundation for the recovery thereof, and the clearing our County from arbitrary tyranny. God save the King

Nutbush,[14] Granville County
6th June 1765.

[14]A settlement on Nutbush Creek, which runs through the northern part of what is now Vance and Warren counties, formerly Granville County.

APPENDIX

Since this article was originally printed, a few additional bits of information have been forthcoming.

In the "Catalogue of Mr. Murphey's materials for the History of North Carolina," under division 6, is listed: "George Sims address to the people of Granville on the subject of abuses by officers of Courts" (In "The Papers of Archibald D. Murphey," ii, 419—Publications of the North Carolina Historical Commission).

In a "Muster Roll of the Regiment in Granville County, under the Command of Colo. William Eaton, as taken at a General Muster of the said regiment 8 October, 1754" is found—"Captain Benjamin Simm's Company," containing seventy-five names (State Records of North Carolina, xxii, 378-9).

In the Archives of the North Carolina Historical Commission there are a number of claims for members of the Sims family. The following is a specimen:

The Ride of Captain Jack—1775*

By Mary Groome McNinch

I

Come hear the ride of Captain Jack
To Philadelphia and back.
John Gilpin never rode as he;
Not Paul Revere, as you shall see,
Nor Tam O'Shanter's maddest mile
Your ear shall from my tale beguile.
'Twas in the year of seventy-five
When liberty began to thrive;
The "Hornets' Nest" was not yet named,
Nor "Esse quam videri" famed;
The fashion was a coat of red,
"God save the King!" forever said;
And be he wrong or be he right,
"God save the King!" from morn 'till night.
But men in Mecklenburg there were
Who dared King George's wrongs aver;
Here in a house of logs, they broke
Their sceptered king's unlawful yoke.
Brave pioneers with conscious power!
They fashioned in that golden hour!
A nation's cradle of repose.
Outside an eager crowd drew near
To give the patriots praise and cheer.

II

Then Captain Jack agreed to be
The messenger to Congress. See!
His hat they bring, his spurs, his sword,
He mounts his horse, a farewell word,
The message safe in hand, at last,
The hated street of Tryon passed,
The stream that skirts the hill is crossed,
They see him gain the wood! He's lost
To view, and then they cheer again
And echo calls a faint refrain.
What ear could follow fast enough,
That beat on beat of thudding hoof?
What eye could mark them flashing by
The woods, the streams, the changing sky?

*Published by request.

All day, all day, all day once more,
Nor half that daring ride is o'er.
No courier of prose nor song
E'er yet did ride so fast and long.
Five hundred weary miles he went,
And half a score of horses spent
Before the Quaker town he spied,
Or rested from his fearsome ride!

III

At once our delegates he sought
And showed the documents he brought,
The president of Congress deemed
The act too premature. It seemed That Jefferson, with wiser eyes,
Knew how to use the "spurious" prize;
And in the immortal page he wrote,
Its substance, he, methinks, did quote;
And thus, though lost to history,
The tidings served their end, you see.
Whatever fate the paper met,
Its bearer we cannot forget.
James Jack is dead long, long ago,
His fame, indeed, shall not be so;
For we will ever tell how he Rode far and well for liberty.

The Passing of the Dram Tree

By Richard Dillard, M.D.

When the gigantic ice-floe on the Albemarle was driven eastward by the winter's storm, its impact, like an irresistible Alpine glacier, swept before it the lone sentinel cypress tree that had stood for more than two centuries, waist deep in water, at the eastern entrance of Edenton Bay.

Come storm, come sunshine, there it stood, the most prominent object in the landscape. By day lifting up its head to the sunshine, and all night to the stars. Securely anchored to the bottom, like Prometheus chained to his rock, it mocked the fury of the white-maned breakers, or made love to the evening zephyr upon its æolian harp. It warned the seaman from the treacherous shoal, and welcomed the mariner from the distant clime to its peaceful port. It furnished the geographer with his line of demarcation for Edenton Bay, and was a guide-post on the 36th parallel of latitude.

Long ago, when Edenton was a busy port and did a flourishing West India trade, it was the custom to keep a bottle of the best West India rum hid in a hollow within its bulbous trunk. It was the duty of each incoming captain to keep the bottle well filled, and whenever a vessel cleared the port and passed the "Dram Tree" the captain and his crew would lower a boat, row to the tree, and drink to the health of Edenton friends, to a prosperous voyage, and a safe return. And so it received, and has always borne, the pseudonym of the "Dram Tree."

Alas, how many mutations of men and things it has witnessed! It saw Edenton as a village, then a borough town whose wharves were crowded with the busy sons of commerce. It saluted the royal governor as he passed in his barge from Eden House to his capital at Edenton. When the Cupola House was built it was standing there; it saw the spire of St. Paul's church when it first lifted its gilded cross to the evening sky. It watched that gathering of patriotic women on the courthouse green, as they emptied their caddies of tea; it caught, like a wireless tower, within its tangled meshes of leaves the first vibrations from the bell at Independence Hall; it caught the first glimpse of Flosser's hostile fleet as it steamed slowly up the sound. Bass and perch and sun-fish cradled their spawns within the convolutions of its wide-expanded bole and the schoolboy marked its distance from the shore as a fit measure of his swimming prowess. It commanded and demanded attention; no matter the point of view, there it was sharply outlined upon the waste of waters, and always a pleasing object to the musing eye.

For generations grandfathers have told grandsons the story of the "Dram Tree," and so it came to pass that everybody knew and loved the old tree. But the "Dram Tree" has vanished. The old man about town has lost a companion of his youth, the landscape a familiar and distinctive charm. In peace let it rest beneath the turbulent waters, and let each wave, as it sweeps by to the shore, murmur a gentle cadence in echo to the associations and traditions of the past!

Sic transit gloria mundi.

ISAAC SHELBY

Revolutionary Patriot and Border Hero

PART II—1780-1783

BY ARCHIBALD HENDERSON

III

At the appointed time, September 25, the several forces united at the rendezvous, already rendered famous by the great treaty held by Colonel Richard Henderson with the Cherokees there in March 1775, the Sycamore Shoals of the Watauga. Hither came Colonel William Campbell with two hundred men, Colonel Arthur Campbell with two hundred men, Colonel Isaac Shelby and Lieutenant-Colonel John Sevier with two hundred and forty men each—uniting with the force of one hundred and sixty men under Colonel Charles McDowell and Major Joseph McDowell, who had been encamped there for some time. An "express" sent by Colonel William Campbell from Washington County, Virginia, had already notified Colonel Benjamin Cleveland of Wilkes County, North Carolina, of the plan; and Cleveland was also urged by an "express" from Colonel McDowell to join the "over-mountain men" on the east side of the mountains with as large a force as he could raise.

The task of raising funds to equip the forces of Shelby and Sevier, and to defray the expenses of the campaign was an extremely difficult problem. The settlers generally had expended their available money for their lands; and so the only available funds were in the hands of the Entry-taker of Sullivan County, John Adair. When Sevier applied to him for the money needed to defray the expenses of the military expedition, Adair replied:

> Colonel Sevier, I have no authority by law to make that disposition of this money. It belongs to the impoverished treasury of North Carolina, and I dare not appropriate a cent of it to any purpose. But, if the country is over-run by the British, liberty is gone. Let the money go too. Take it. If the enemy, by its use, is driven from the country, I can trust that country to justify and vindicate my conduct. Take it.

For this indispensable sum, amounting to twelve thousand seven hundred and thirty-five dollars, Shelby and Sevier pledged themselves to see it refunded or its use legalized by an act of the Legislature; and this recognizance was afterwards scrupulously fulfilled.[1]

It seemed to the enemy that the over-mountain men had been assembled as if by magic. "The wild and fierce inhabitants of . . . (the) settlements westward of the Alleghany mountains," said Mackenzie in his Strictures, "assembled suddenly and silently." In his letter of October 24, 1780, Lord Rawdon significantly observed: "A numerous army now appeared on the frontier, drawn from Nolachucky, and other settlements beyond the mountains, whose very names had been unknown to us." On September 26, this force of one thousand and forty frontiersmen set forth upon the march. Before leaving the camp at Watauga, a farewell sermon was delivered by the Reverend Samuel Doak, who (according to trustworthy tradition) urged them to do battle valiantly, closing with a stirring invocation to "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon"—a sentiment greeted with a lusty shout of acclaim from the hardy mountaineers. At Quaker Meadows in Burke County, the famous home of the McDowells, which they reached on September 30, there was encamped a force of three hundred and fifty militia—the hardy followers of that fierce and blood-thirsty fighter, Colonel Benjamin Cleveland, "Old Roundabout," who called themselves "Cleveland's Bulldogs"; the stalwart riflemen of Rutherford under Colonel

Andrew Hampton, and the flower of the militant citizenship of Surry led by a born leader of men, a cousin of Patrick Henry, Colonel Joseph Winston.[2]

Already on September 14 preceding, General William Lee Davidson had ordered Cleveland to unite with other forces to resist Ferguson's advance; and under the present plan the prospects seemed to favor successful resistance. The commanders of the different divisions, all of whom had acted with executive authority, controlled their troops only through voluntary agreement on the part of the privates. In view of petty disorders and insubordination, the commanding officers on the second day (October 2) after resuming the march, held a conference to devise plans for quieting the disturbances, and also for the purpose of choosing a leader. "It was resolved," says Shelby in his Pamphlet (1823), "to send to Head-Quarters for a general officer to command us; and that, in the mean time, we should meet in council every day to determine on the measures to be pursued, and appoint any of our own body to put them in execution. I was not satisfied with this course, as I thought it calculated to produce delay, when expedition and dispatch were all important to us. We were then in sixteen or eighteen miles of Gilbert Town, where we supposed Ferguson to be. I suggested these things to the council, and then observed to the officers, that we were all North Carolinians except Col. Campbell, who was from Virginia; that I knew him to be a man of good sense, and warmly attached to the cause of his country; that he commanded the largest regiment; and that if they concurred with me, until a general officer should arrive from Head-Quarters, appoint him to command us, and march immediately against the enemy. To this proposition some one or two said 'agreed.' No written minute or record was made of it."[3] Shelby acknowledges that that he did this to "silence the expectation of Col. McDowell" to command the expedition. This was a legitimate expectation on the part of Col. McDowell, who was the commanding officer of the district in which the force was operating, and had, as Shelby further admits, "commanded the armies of militia in that quarter all the summer before against the same enemy." The objections urged against McDowell by Shelby were that he was "too far advanced in life" and "too inactive" for the command of an expedition which required extraordinary resources in strength and endurance. The first objection, mentioned by Shelby at the advanced age of seventy-three, is not founded on fact, and was perhaps due to defective memory; for McDowell was a vigorous young man of thirty-seven in 1780. In his narrative,[4] Shelby states merely that McDowell "was too slow an officer" for the enterprise. There was at no time any question of the bravery or patriotism of McDowell.[5]

During the progress of the conference, Campbell took Shelby aside and requested that his name be withdrawn and that Shelby himself take the command. To this, Shelby very correctly replied that he was the youngest Colonel present; and that McDowell under whom he had served, would resent his elevation to the chief command. Shelby probably realized that the over-mountain men, at all times unaccustomed to strict military discipline and somewhat prone to insubordination, would not readily accept the leadership in this meteoric campaign of a militia commander conspicuous neither for rare discretion nor for exceptional efficiency. The selection of Campbell was undoubtedly a temporary expedient, a tactful mode of bridging an awkward situation; yet it is clear that these border leaders would never have agreed to Shelby's suggestion that the chief command be given, even temporarily, to Campbell, had they not recognized in him an efficient leader and known him to be a true soldier. One final conclusion is irresistible: that Shelby himself, as originator and prime mover in the expedition, more than any other was entitled to the chief command.

Colonel McDowell, who, as Shelby frankly says, "had the good of his country more at heart than any title of command," cheerfully acquiesced in the council's decision; but observed that as he was not to have the chief command, he would volunteer to convey to headquarters at Hillsborough the request for a general officer. On October 4, McDowell started on his errand from the mouth of Cane Creek near Gilbert Town, where the American force was encamped.[6] He bore with him a significant letter, to which the chief historian of the battle did not have access.[7] He left his men under the command of his brother, Major Joseph McDowell. Colonel Campbell now assumed temporarily the chief command, but he was to be regulated and directed by the determinations of the Colonels, who were to meet in council every day. It is noticeable that the list of signatures is not headed by that of Campbell, and does not include that of Charles McDowell, the bearer.

Rutherford County, Camp near Gilberttown

Oct 4, 1780.

Sir, We have now collected at this place about 1500 good men, drawn from the Counties of Surry, Wilkes, Burke, Washington and Sullivan Counties in this State, and Washington County in Virginia, and expect to be joined in a few days by Col. Clarke of Georgia, and Col. Williams of South Carolina, with about 1000 more—As we have at this time called out our Militia without any orders from the Executive of our different States, and with the view of Expelling the Enemy out of this part of the Country, we think such a body of men worthy of your attention, and would request you to send a General Officer, immediately to take the command of such Troops as may embody in this quarter—Our Troops being all Militia, and but little acquainted with discipline, we could wish him to be a Gentleman of address, and able to keep up a proper discipline, without disgusting the Soldiery—Every assistance in our power, shall be given the Officer you may think proper to take the command of us.

[6]It is worthy of note that, on his way to Hillsborough, McDowell called at the camp of Lacy and Hill, with their South Carolinians, and at that of Williams with the Rowan Corps, at Flint Hill, a dozen miles or so to the eastward of the head of Cane Creek. These forces, being thus notified of the march against Ferguson, formed a junction with Campbell's forces on October 6.

It is the wish of such of us as are acquainted with General Davidson and Col. Morgan (if in service) that one of them Gentlemen may be appointed to this command.

We are in great want of Ammunition, and hope you will endeavor to have us properly furnished with that Article.

Col. McDowell will wait upon you with this, who can inform you of the present situation of the Enemy, and such other particulars respecting our Troops as you may think necessary.

By Col. Charles McDowell Major General Smallwood Letter from
Col. Cleveland &c[8]
4th October S0.

A memorable incident, indicative of the indomitable determination of the American forces, deserves record here. Before resuming the march on October 3, the Colonels notified the assembled troops of the nature and hazard of the enterprise before them; and the offer was made that any one who so desired, might withdraw then and there from the campaign. Shelby thus laconically addressed the men:

You have all been informed of the offer. You who desire to decline it, will, when the word is given, march three steps to the rear, and stand, prior to which a few more minutes will be granted you for consideration.

[8] Cf. N. C. State Records, xiv, 663-4. A photographic facsimile of the signatures to this letter, made at my order from the original letter, shows that, contrary to the testimony of Mr. Roosevelt, who spells it "Cleavland," the correct spelling is "Cleveland."

After a pause the order was given that "those who desired to back out would step three paces to the rear," but not a man withdrew. Shelby then addressed the men in words which convey a vivid impression of the spirit of the movement and the character of the campaign:

> I am heartily glad to see you to a man resolve to meet and fight your country's foes. When we encounter the enemy, don't wait for the word of command. Let each one of you be your own officer, and do the very best you can, taking every care you can of yourselves, and availing yourselves of every advantage that chance may throw in your way. If in the woods, shelter yourselves, and give them Indian play; advance from tree to tree, pressing the enemy and killing and disabling all you can. Your officers will shrink from no danger—they will be consistently with you, and the moment the enemy give war, be on the alert and strictly obey orders.[9]

The taunt of Ferguson, by which he had hoped to intimidate the men of the back-country, evoked a retort he little expected. Ferguson's principal object at this time was to strike a crushing blow at the small band of partisans under Captain Elijah Clarke, who about the middle of September was threatening Augusta, Georgia, and was still hovering dangerously near the Carolina line. Ferguson was hoping for and expecting the return of furloughed loyalists in large numbers under Gibbes, the militia under Cruger at Ninety-Six, or Tarleton's Legion ordered thither by Cornwallis. Two deserters from the camp of the Americans came in on September 30 to warn Ferguson of the approach of the frontier army. Had Ferguson struck straight for Charlotte and a junction there with Cornwallis, he might have eluded Campbell's force. But he was confronted with the danger of permitting the union of the forces of Clarke and Campbell; the necessity of recalling numerous Tories, absent on furlough belonging to his own force; and the danger of disaffection to the loyalist cause on the part of the people of that region. Perhaps Lieutenant-Colonel Cruger had a deeper insight into the nature of the situation than had Ferguson; for in his reply (October 3, 1780) to Ferguson's dispatch of September 30th, with its alarming news of "so considerable (a) force as you understand is coming from the mountains," Cruger makes these eminently sane observations: "I Don't see how you can possibly (defend) the country and its neighborhood that you (are) now in. . . . I flattered myself they (the Tory militia) would have been equal to the mountain lads, and that no further call for the defensive would have been (made?) on this part of the Province. I begin to think our views for the present rather large. We have been led to this, probably, in expecting too much from the militia."[10]

Aware of some of the dangers incident to the situation, Ferguson despatched messengers to Cornwallis, asking for assistance; but these, being pursued, were delayed by reason of the circuitous route they were forced to take, and so did not reach Charlotte until the day after the battle at King's Mountain. Ferguson scorned to seek protection by making a forced march in order to effect a junction with Cornwallis at Charlotte. He preferred to make a stand, and, if possible, to dispose once for all of this barbarian mountain horde. From his camp Ferguson issued the following inflammatory and obscene appeal to the people, well calculated to arouse their bitter hostility to the approaching band, which he characterized as murderers of men and ravishers of women.

Denard's Ford, Broad River,

Tryon County, October 1, 1780.

GENTLEMEN:—Unless you wish to be eat up by an inundation of barbarians, who have begun by murdering an unarmed son before his aged father and afterward lopped off his arms, and who by their shocking cruelties and irregularities, give the best proof of their cowardice and want of discipline; I say if you want to be pinioned, robbed, and murdered, and see your wives and daughters, in four days, abused by the dregs of mankind—in short, if you wish or deserve to live, and bear the name of men grasp your arms in a moment and run to camp.

The Back Water men have crossed the mountains; McDowell, Hampton, Shelby, and Cleveland are at their head, so that you know what you have to depend upon. If you choose to be p—d upon by a set of mongrels, say so at once, and let your women turn their backs upon you and look out for real men to protect them.

PAT. FERGUSON,
Major 71st Regiment.[11]

Loitering on his march, presumably in the hope of striking Clarke, Ferguson did not reach King's Mountain until October 6. On reaching Gilbert Town (near Rutherfordton, N. C.) on October 4, the Americans discovered that Ferguson had retired. "Having gained a knowledge of his design," related Shelby, "it was determined in a council of the principal officers to pursue him with all possible dispatch. Accordingly two nights before the action the officers were engaged all night in selecting the best men, the best horses and the best rifles, and at the dawn of day took Ferguson's trail and pursued him. . . . The mountain men had turned out to catch Ferguson. He was their object, and for the last thirty-six hours they never alighted from their horses but once to refresh at the Cowpens for an hour (where they were joined by Col. Williams of South Carolina, on the evening of the 6th with about 400 men), although the day of the action was so extremely wet that the men could only keep their guns dry by wrapping their bags, blankets and hunting shirts around the locks, which exposed their bodies to a heavy and incessant rain."[12]

In this connection, there is need of further detail in regard to the force under Williams. The account given by Draper is at once imperfect and distorted; and his estimate is grievously warped by the prejudiced account written by South Carolinians who held Williams in detestation. James D. Williams was not a South Carolinian; he was born in Hanover County, Virginia, in November, 1740. Since childhood he had lived in Granville County, N. C., whither the Williams family removed at an early date; and here he remained until 1772, when he went to South Carolina and settled on Little River in Laurens County. At the battle of Musgrove Mill, as related by Shelby himself, Williams[13] commanded the American center, while Shelby and Clarke commanded the right and left wings, respectively. The most reliable authorities state that Williams held the chief command in this battle.[14] On his arrival at Hillsborough whither he conducted the prisoners taken at Musgrove Mill, Williams conveyed the news of this victory to Governor Rutledge of South Carolina, then a refugee from his own State. In recognition of the victory at Musgrove Mill, achieved by the force commanded by Williams, Governor Rutledge commissioned him as a brigadier general in the South Carolina militia.[15] On September 8, Governor Abner Nash of North Carolina instructed General Williams to go to Caswell and other counties and recruit a corps of volunteer horsemen, not to exceed one hundred, for active service against the enemy.[16] This force, about seventy in number, Williams enlisted chiefly while encamped at Higgins' plantation in Rowan County. These recruits were brave and reliable soldiers; and they came from a county noted for its patriotism and its hostility to England. "It was evident and it had frequently been mentioned to the King's Officers," says Banastre Tarleton in his Campaigns of 1780 and 1781 in the Southern Provinces, "that the counties of Mecklenburg and Rowan were more hostile to England that any others in America."[17]

[15]The official report, which in itself constitutes proof that Williams was in command at Musgrove Mill, was drawn up and signed by Williams; and this is the only contemporary report of the battle from the field. On September 5, 1780, Williams' official report was forwarded by General Gates to the President of Congress. The full report was published in the Pennsylvania Packet on September 23, and doubtless earlier in North Carolina newspapers; but the substance of the report, doubtless communicated by Governor Rutledge, appeared in the Virginia Gazette as early as September 13. [17]The slur cast upon these Rowan recruits by the venomous Colonel Hill in his Manuscript Narrative only reflect upon their author. The Legislature of North Carolina, in November, 1788, acting upon a report submitted by Mr. Thomas Person, resolved: "That the estate of James Williams, deceased, late

The number chosen from the over-mountain men to go forward from the ford of Green River on the night of October 5, was about seven hundred; and at the Cowpens, as accurately stated by Shelby, they were reinforced by four hundred men under Williams.[18] Here a second selection of nine hundred and ten horsemen was made; and Colonel Campbell was retained in the chief command—the urgency of the pursuit making it inadvisable to await the coming of the general officer for whom Col. Charles McDowell had gone to Hillsborough. This force, closely followed by some eighty-odd footmen ("foot-cavalry") pushed forward from the Cowpens on the night of October 6, in pursuit of the elusive Ferguson.

So heavy was the fall of rain during the forenoon and so weary and jaded were the men, that Campbell, Sevier and Cleveland urged a halt; but to this proposal the iron Shelby, intent upon the capture and destruction of the men who had threatened to hang him, gruffly replied with an oath: "I will not stop until night, if I follow Ferguson into Cornwallis' lines." As they approached King's Mountain, they encountered three men who reported that they were just from the British camp, which was posted upon the plateau, and that there was a picket guard on the road not far ahead. "These men," says Benjamin Sharp in his account, "were detained lest they should find means to inform the enemy of our approach, and Col. Shelby, with a select party, undertook to surprise and take the picket; this he accomplished without firing a gun or giving the least alarm; and it was hailed by the army as a good omen."[19] [18]On October 2, Brigadier General Williams reported to Major-General Gates that the number then with him in Burke County was "about four hundred and fifty horsemen." Cf. N. C. State Records, xv. 94. He was in error as to his location, which was actually in Lincoln County.

See W. A. Graham: Gen. Joseph Graham and His Revolutionary Papers, 282-3. In speaking of "our march to the Yadkin," Cornwallis calls the Rowan section "one of the most rebellious tracts in America."

IV

The remarkable battle which ensued presents an extraordinary contrast in the character of the combatants and the nature of the strategy and tactics employed. Each party ran true to form—the heroic and brilliant Ferguson repeating Braddock's suicidal tactics of opposing bayonet charges to the deadly fusillade of riflemen, carefully posted, Indian fashion, behind trees and every shelter afforded by the natural inequalities of the ground. In the army of the Carolina and Virginia frontiersmen, composed of independent commands recruited from many sources and each solicitous for its own credit, each command was directed in the battle by its own leader. Campbell, like Cleveland, Shelby, McDowell, Sevier, and Hambright, personally led his own division; but the nature of the fighting and the peculiarity of the terrain made it impossible for him, though the chosen commander of the expedition, in actuality to play such a role. The tactics agreed upon in advance by the frontier commanders were simple enough—to surround and capture Ferguson's camp on the high plateau. The more experienced Indian fighters, Sevier and Shelby, unquestionably suggested the general tactics in accordance with their experience, which in any case would doubtless have been employed by the frontiersmen: to give the British "Indian-play," namely, to take cover anywhere and fire from natural shelter. Cleveland, a Hercules in strength and courage, who had fought the Indians and recognized the wisdom of Indian tactics, ordered his men, as did some of the other leaders, to give way before a bayonet charge —but to return to the attack after the charge had spent its force.

My brave fellows, we have beaten the Tories and we can do it again. . . . If they had the spirit of men, they would join with their fellow-citizens in supporting the independence of their country. When you are engaged, you are not to wait for the word of command from me. I will show you, by my example, how to fight; I can undertake no more. Every man must consider himself an officer and act from his own judgment. Fire as quick as you can, and stand your ground as long as you can. When you can do no better, get behind trees or retreat; but I beg you not to run quite off. If we are repulsed, let us make a point of returning and renewing the fight; perhaps we may have better luck in the second attempt than in the first.

The plateau upon which Ferguson was encamped was the top of an eminence about six hundred yards long and about two hundred and fifty from one base across to the other; and its shape was that of an Indian paddle, varying from one hundred and twenty yards at the blade to sixty yards at the handle in width. Outcropping boulders upon the outer edge of the plateau afforded some slight shelter for Ferguson's force; but, unsuspicious of the coming attack, Ferguson had made no abatis to protect his camp from the attack to which it was so vulnerable from the cover of the timber surrounding it on all sides. In taking their positions, the center to the North-East was occupied by Cleveland with his Bulldogs, Hambright with his South Fork Boys, from the Catawba (now Lincoln County, North Carolina), and Winston with his Surry Riflemen; to the South were the divisions under Joseph McDowell (brother of Charles) who was in touch with Winston, Sevier and Campbell; while the South Carolinians under Lacey, who was in touch with Cleveland, the Rowan levies under Williams, and the Watauga borderers under Shelby were stationed upon the North side. Ferguson's force consisted of Provincial Rangers, one hundred and fifty strong, and of well drilled loyalists, between eight and nine hundred, seriously weakened by the absence of a foraging party of between one and two hundred who had gone off on the morning the battle occurred. Shelby's men, before getting into position, received a hot fire, the opening shots of the engagement—which inspired Campbell, who now threw off his coat, to shout encouraging orders to his men, posted on the side of the mountain opposite to Shelby's force. When Campbell's Virginians uttered a series of piercing shouts, De

Peyster, second in command, remarked to his chief: "These things are ominous—these are the damned yelling boys."

The battle, which lasted some minutes short of an hour, was waged with terrific ferocity. The loyalist militia, wherever possible, fired from the shelter of the rocks; while the Provincial Corps, with fixed bayonets, steadily charged the frontiersmen, who fired at close range and rapidly withdrew to the very base of the mountain. After each bayonet charge, the Provincials coolly withdrew to the summit, under the accumulating fire of the returning mountaineers, who quickly gathered in their rear. Owing to their elevation, the British, although using the rapid-fire breech-loading rifle invented by Ferguson himself, found their vision deflected, continually firing high; and thus suffered nature's handicap, refraction.[20] The militia, using sharpened butcher knives which Ferguson taught them to utilize as bayonets, charged against the mountaineers; but their fire, in answer to the deadly fusillade of the expert squirrel shooters, was belated, owing to the fact that they could not fire so long as the crudely improvised bayonets remained in their pieces. The Americans, continually firing upward, found ready marks for their aim in the clearly delineated outlines of their adversaries; and felt the exultation which animates the hunter who has tracked to his lair and entrapped wild game at bay.

The leaders of the various divisions of the mountaineers bore themselves with impetuous bravery, recklessly exposing themselves between the lines of fire and with native eloquence, interspersed with mild profanity, rallying their individual commands, from end to end, once more to the attack. Campbell scaled the rugged heights, encouraging his men to the ascent. Cleveland resolutely facing the foe, rallied his bulldogs with the inspiriting words: "Come, boys, let's try 'em again. We'll have better luck next time." The most deadly charge, led by De Peyster himself, fell upon Hambright's South Fork boys; and Major Chronicle, waving his military hat, fell dead, the command, "Face to the hill!" dying upon his lips. These veteran soldiers met the shock of the charge; a number of their men were shot down or transfixed, and the remainder, reserving their fire until the charging column was only a few feet away, poured in a deadly volley before retiring. William Lenoir, independently fighting in Winston's column, was in the forefront of the hottest battle, his reckless bravery making him a veritable target for the enemy. He received several wounds and his hair and his clothes were riddled with bullets. The ranking American officer, Brigadier General James Williams, was mortally wounded on the "very top of the mountain, in the thickest of the fight"; and as he revived for a moment, an eye-witness relates, his first words were: "For God's sake, boys, don't give up the hill." Hambright, sorely wounded, his boot overflowing with blood and his hat riddled with three bullet holes, declined to dismount, but pressed gallantly forward, exclaiming in his "Pennsylvania Dutch": "Huzza, my prave poys, fight on a few minutes more, and te pattle will be over!" On the British side Ferguson was supremely brave, rapidly dashing from one side to the other, oblivious to all danger. Wherever the shrill note of his silver whistle sounded, there the fighting was hottest and the British resistance deadliest. His officers fought with the characteristic steadiness of the British soldier, and again and again charged headlong against the wavering circle of the frontiersmen.[21]

Ferguson's authentic boast—that "he was on King's Mountain, that he was king of the mountain and that God Almighty could not drive him from it"—was doubtless prompted, less by belief in the impregnability of his position, than by a desire to inspire confidence in his men. His position was admirably chosen for defense against attack by troops employing regulation tactics; but never dreaming of the possibility of sudden investment, Ferguson had erected no defenses for his encampment. The disesteem in which he held the mountaineers found expression in the passionate declaration: "I will never surrender to such damned banditti as the mountain men." His frenzied efforts on the battle-field seem like a mad rush against fate; for his position was indefensible against the peculiar tactics of the frontiersmen. While the mountain flamed like a volcano and resounded with the thunder of the guns, a steady stricture was in progress; the lines were drawn tighter and tighter around the trapped and frantically struggling army; and at last the fall of their commander, riddled with bullets, proved the mad futility of further resistance. The game was caught and bagged to a man. When Winston with his fox-hunters of Surry dashed recklessly through the woods, says a chronicler of the battle, and "the last to come into position:

> 'Flow'd in, and settling, circled all the lists,' then

> 'From all the circle of the hills
> Death sleeted in upon the doomed.' "[22]

In reviewing the details of the battle, especial interest attaches here to everything which concerns Isaac Shelby. In a contemporary letter to his father, he gives the following terse account of the battle:

> That Providence who always rules and governs all things for the best, so ordered it that we were around them before we were discovered, and formed in such position, so as to fire on them nearly about (sic) the same time, though they heard us in time to form and stood ready. The battle continued warm for an hour; the enemy finding themselves so embarassed on all sides, surrendered themselves prisoners to us at discretion.
> They had taken post at that place with the confidence that no force could rout them; the mountain was high, and exceedingly steep, so that their situation gave them greatly the advantage; indeed it was almost equal to storming a battery. In most cases we could not see them until we were within twenty yards of them. They repelled us three times with charged bayonets; but being determined to conquer or die, we came up a fourth time, and fairly got possession of the top of the mountain.[23]

The final general order to the mountain men, before the engagement, was eloquent of the general determination: "Fresh prime your guns, and every man go into battle firmly resolved to fight till he dies!"

"The enemy," says Robert Campbell, "annoyed our troops very much from their advantageous position. Col. Shelby, being previously ordered to reconnoitre their position, observing their situation, and what a destructive fire was kept up from those rocks, ordered Robert Campbell, one of the officers of the Virginia Line, to move to the right with a small company to endeavor to dislodge them, and lead them on nearly to the ground which he had ordered them, under fire of the enemy's lines and within forty steps of the same; but discovering that our men were repulsed on the other side of the mountain, he gave orders to advance, and post themselves opposite to the rocks, and near to the enemy, and then returned to assist in bringing up the men in order, who had been charged with the bayonet. These orders were punctually obeyed, and they kept up such a galling fire as to compel Ferguson to order a company of regulars to face them, with a view to cover his men that were posted behind the rocks. At this time a considerable fire was drawn to this side of the mountain by the repulse of those on the other, and the Loyalists not being permitted to leave their posts. This scene was not of long duration, for it was the brave Virginia volunteers, and those under Col. Shelby, on their attempting rapidly to ascend the mountain, that were charged with the bayonet. They obstinately stood until some of them were thrust through the body, and having nothing but their rifles by which to defend themselves, they were forced to retreat.

They were soon rallied by their gallant commanders, Campbell, Shelby, and other brave officers, and by a constant and well-directed fire of their rifles, drove them back in their turn, strewing the face of the mountain with their assailants, and kept advancing until they drove them from some of their posts."[24] Shelby's men, by his own statement, actually reached the summit of the mountain which "was covered with flame and smoke and seemed to thunder."[25]

The regiments of Shelby and Campbell began the attack; and the enemy first fired upon Shelby's men before they were in position. This galling fire distressed the mountaineers, who were heard to mutter that "it would never do to be shot down without returning the fire." To which the intrepid Shelby cooly replied: "Pass on to your places, and then your fire will not be lost."[26] Bancroft says: "Shelby, a man of the hardiest make, stiff as iron, among the dauntless singled out for dauntlessness, went right onward and upward like a man who had but one thing to do, and but one thought—to do it." Brave as he and his men were, says Draper, they, too, had to retreat before the charging column, but firing as they retired. When, at the bottom of the hill, Shelby wanted to bring his men to order, he would cry out—"Now, boys, quickly reload your rifles, and give them another hell of a fire."[27]

Throughout the entire battle, Shelby's inspiriting battle-cry was: "Never shoot until you see an enemy, and never see an enemy without bringing him down."[28]

Shelby was in the very front line of the fight from the outset of the engagement to its very close. "When the British were loudly calling for quarters, but uncertain whether they would be granted," says Benjamin Sharp, "I saw the intrepid Shelby rush his horse within fifteen paces of their lines, and commanded them to lay down their arms, and they should have quarters. Some would call this an imprudent act, but it shows the daring bravery of the man."[29] As the demoralized Tories continued to cry "Quarters! Quarters!," Shelby fiercely shouted: "Damn you! If you want quarters, throw down your arms!" In a letter written by John Sevier to Isaac Shelby (Aug. 27, 1812), we read: "You were in the heat of the action. I frequently saw you animating your men to victory. At the surrender, you were the first field officer I recollect to have seen. . . . I perfectly recollect on seeing you at the close of the action, that I swore by —— they had burnt off your hair, for it was much burnt on one side."

Owing to the volley fired upon the victors by a returning foraging party of the British, a fire which killed the daring General James Williams, the incensed Americans under Campbell's orders returned the fire, though the British had already surrendered. This created a very alarming situation, and Shelby, who feared that the enemy might yet, perhaps, snatch up their arms in self-defense and resume the battle, exclaimed: "Good God! What can we do in the confusion?" "We can order the prisoners from their arms," said Captain Sawyers. "Yes," responded Shelby, "that can be done"; and the prisoners were accordingly marched off, and placed under a strong guard.

Ferguson was mortally wounded near the close of the action; and as he was being carried off, the exultant Shelby rode up and with incredible callousness said to him, though doubtless life was then totally extinct: "Colonel, the fatal blow is struck—we've Burgoyned you."[30] In the division of Ferguson's effects, the foot-long silver whistle, the piercing note of which had been heard again and again above the clamor and din of the battle, fell to Shelby's lot.

According to expert military opinion, the plan of attack employed by the Americans was probably the only method of assault by which the British could have been defeated. Impartial examination of all the evidence available, which includes much material not accessible to Draper, leads to the conclusion that the chief credit for inaugurating the entire campaign belongs to Shelby. The nominal leadership was conferred upon Campbell; and among the reasons, not already mentioned, assigned for giving him the chief command, were that he commanded the largest division of the forces and had come from the greatest distance. In the battle the conditions of combat enabled him to do little more than lead the men of his own division; and this he did with conspicuous bravery and gallantry. It is scarcely to be doubted that the very tactics pursued in the battle, the only tactics it would seem which could have been successful, were outlined, not by Campbell, but by Shelby himself. The following significant lines, from a letter written to Shelby by Colonel John Sevier, from Marble Springs, Tennessee, August 27, 1812, are eloquent on the point:—

> As to the plan of attacking the enemy, yourself was the only person that named the mode to me, and the same was acceded to unanimously. No doubt you recollect we argued on the manner of attack immediately after Ferguson's spies were taken, while we were a little in front of our army, and as we were returning back to Campbell and the other officers.[31]

VI

A digression from the continuity of the narrative is necessary at this point, in order to bring to light valuable documents, hitherto unpublished, which throw into truer perspective the role played by Shelby in the King's Mountain campaign. They tend to correct some of the false impressions fostered by Roosevelt and, to a lesser degree, by Draper.

On February 11, 1781, the North Carolina State Senate, in session at Halifax, placed the following on record:—

> Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be requested, with the Speaker of the Commons, to transmit to Colonel Campbell, of Virginia, Colonel Cleveland, Colonel Shelby, and the brave Officers and Soldiers under their command the following address, to wit:

[31] "Hero of Three Wars," by C. H. Todd, in Journal of American History, 2nd number, 2nd volume, 1908. These lines from Sevier's letter have been omitted generally by historians, even by Draper in King's Mountain and Its Heroes (pp. 575-6). Such an omission is almost inexplicable.

GENTLEMEN:

The General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, impressed with a deep sense of your eminent services during the last Summer's Campaign have unanimously resolved that the Speakers of the two Houses should transmit to you their warmest acknowledgments for your spirited and vigorous Exertions against the formidable body of British Forces under Major Ferguson at King's Mountain. The alacrity with which you stepped forth uncalled for by Authority, your Vigilance in Marching to, and your conduct in, the attack of the Enemy, deserve the highest Encomiums, and strongly mark Patriotism and Heroism united in the same persons. To these Virtues, which you, Gentlemen, so happily possess, your Country is indebted for the important Victory which frustrated the schemes of the enemy, awed many of the disaffected into submission, and rescued the western parts of this State from devastation and ruin and the horrors attendant on a War directed by Tyranny and pursued with vindictive Resentment.

We do therefore in obedience to the order of the two Houses and with the highest satisfaction to ourselves transmit to you the thanks of your country by its representatives in General Assembly.

Ordered that the foregoing Address with the following Message be sent the Commons for concurrence.

MR. SPEAKER AND GENTLEMEN:

We send for your approbation an address proposed by this House to be presented the officers who distinguished themselves in the capture of the British, commanded by Major Ferguson, at King's Mountain.

Resolved, that an elegant mounted sword be presented to each of the following officers, that is to say, Colo. Cleveland, of Wilkes County, Colonel Campbell of Virginia, Colonel Shelby of Sullivan County, Lieutenant Colonel Sevier of Washington County, Lieutenant Colonel Hambright of Lincoln County, Major Winston of Surry County and Major Shelby of Sullivan County for their voluntary and distinguished services in the defeat of Major Ferguson at the battle of King's Mountain.

An extraordinary series of blunders, which to this day have remained unexplained, now took place in connection with the "resolution" above-mentioned. The original journal of the assembly, as well as the printed copy, contains a message from the House to the Senate, approving of the "address" above-mentioned; but nowhere in the original journal is record or even mention made of any action taken by the House upon the Senate "resolution" concerning the swords. That no steps were taken to procure and present the swords mentioned in the resolution was doubtless due to the fact that the journal contained no record of the joint concurrence of House and Senate in this "resolution"; and consequently no committee was appointed to carry out the terms of the "resolution." Shelby and Sevier both believed that the swords had been voted them by the Assembly.[32]

The question which remains unanswered until the present day is: "Did the Legislature of North Carolina in February, 1781, vote the swords to Shelby, Sevier, Winston, and the others mentioned in the 'resolution'?" The original manuscript of the "resolution" itself, still preserved, and now in the Archives of the North Carolina Historical Commission, conclusively shows that the swords were thus voted. Upon it are inscribed the following:—

In the H Commons 11 Feby 1781
Concurred with
By order
Jno Hunt C H C

and the endorsement:

11th Feby laid over til Tomorrow morning.

The "resolution" was "laid over" until February 12, awaiting action upon the "address"; and the "address," bearing the approval of the House, was received by the Senate on February 13. The explanation of the blunder is probably due to the careless reading of the secretary who compiled the journal in failing to note, and so, to record, that the "address" and the "resolution" were two different things and that both had been concurred with by the House.

[32] N. C. State Records, xvii, 696-7, 704, support the statements made above. In his Annals of Tennessee, 248, Ramsey is in error in stating that the General Assembly of North Carolina in 1781 "passed a resolution that a sword and pistols should be presented to both Shelby and Sevier." As printed in the N. C. State Records, xvii, 697, "Lewis" is a misprint for "Sevier."

Shortly after the battle of King's Mountain, the General Assembly of Virginia "ordered that a good horse, with elegant furniture, and a sword" be presented to William Campbell.[33] Singularly enough, Virginia like North Carolina was inexplicably dilatory in carrying out the will of the General Assembly. At the instance of friends of the late William Campbell, the General Assembly of Virginia in 1809, it appears, caused a handsome and costly sword, purchased in France, to be presented to William Campbell Preston, William Campbell's grandson.

When this information reached Shelby in 1809, it produced, as he acknowledges, "some feelings of emulation and solicitude, and a sense that equal justice had not been done to all who participated in that memorable achievement." Accordingly, he engaged in private correspondence with John Sevier on the subject; and years afterwards frankly acknowledged that the object of the letters was "to concert with him (Sevier) the means of reminding North Carolina of her ancient promise, and of obtaining those swords which thirty years before had been voted to us, as the honorable memorials of our good conduct, and our country's approbation." Shelby confessed to his very natural sense of the injustice in the recognition of Campbell, while Sevier and himself remained unrecognized.[34]

During the political campaign of 1812, when Shelby was making the race for the governorship of Kentucky, falsehoods were freely circulated against him, minimizing the part he played in the King's Mountain campaign. To meet these charges, an article signed "Narrator" appeared in the Kentucky Reporter, July 25, 1812, giving undue credit to Shelby as leader of the King's Mountain campaign and casting unworthy aspersions upon the bravery of Colonel Campbell. The article was replied to in the same paper, of June 20, 1813, by William C. Preston, who made a spirited vindication of the charge of cowardice preferred against his grandfather.

Nine years later, the controversy broke forth anew, when Colonel George Washington Sevier caused to be published in the Nashville Gazette four private letters written to his father, John Sevier, by Isaac Shelby. In one of these letters, (January 1, 1810), Shelby makes the damaging charge:

> It is a fact well known, and for which he (Campbell) apologized to me the day after the action, that he was not within less than one quarter of a mile of the enemy at the time they surrendered to you and myself.

This brought forth from William C. Preston another statement in the newspapers of the day, entitled "Colonel Campbell and Governor Shelby," claiming the chief honors of the victory at King's Mountain for his grandfather, and vehemently repelling the insinuation of cowardice contained in Shelby's private letter to Sevier, lately given to the public by G. W. Sevier.

An elaborate survey and investigation of the whole question was then made by Shelby and published as a pamphlet in 1823.[35] Extended replies to this pamphlet were made: by William C. Preston in the Telescope of Columbia, S. C., May 10, 1823, and by General John Campbell in the Enquirer of Richmond, Va., June 24, 1823. This prolonged and regrettable controversy had certain important consequences, and resulted in establishing certain cardinal facts touching the conduct of Campbell, Shelby and Sevier. Campbell's fame remained entirely undimmed by the charges of Shelby, who, clearly, had misinterpreted a remark made by Campbell on the battle-field; and furthermore Shelby was utterly misled, through the fact that Campbell's body servant rode his horse during the battle, into the belief that Campbell remained in the rear during the action. The credit for initiating the campaign, it was clearly established, belonged to Shelby, who acted in concert with Sevier. There is no reason to doubt that Shelby was entirely honest in believing the charges, however unworthy and untrue, which he preferred against Campbell.

In his article in the Telescope, Wm. C. Preston published an affidavit of Colonel Matthew Willoughby, in which he discredited the testimony of Moses Shelby, brother of Isaac, who had testified in the Shelby pamphlet (1823) that during the latter half of the battle of King's Mountain, Campbell remained stationary near the foot of the mountain, in plain sight of him. Colonel Willoughby deputed that "the statement of Moses Shelby would not, perhaps, be credited, from the character he bore about the time and after the battle, as he, with others, was engaged in plundering in the Carolinas, both Whigs and Tories, and running the property so plundered to this side of the mountains."

The following letter from Isaac Shelby to John J. Crittenden, famous Kentuckian, who had been Shelby's Aide-de-camp on the Canadian campaign in the War of 1812, is important as giving valuable evidence, not only concerning the character of Moses Shelby, but also in regard to the battle of King's Mountain. It was evidently not seen by Draper, or by Roosevelt, who accepts, apparently without question, the charges against Moses Shelby.

Danville, June 16th, 1823.

My Dear Sir,—You have no doubt before this seen the replies of both General Preston and his son to my publication. Colonel Preston proposes to establish for his own father the merit of planning the expedition which led to Ferguson's defeat.

I have examined the subject in my own mind in every point of view, and cannot in the remotest manner discover wherein General Preston could have had any agency in this exploit. I lived nearly one hundred and twenty miles from him, in a different State, and had no kind of communication with him on the subject, and from every recollection, I am convinced that the statement I gave you is indisputably true. I recollect, however, that Major Cloyd, with three hundred men from the county of Montgomery, commanded by Colonel Preston, fought an action with the Tories at the shallow ford of the Yadkin River, nearly one hundred miles north of King's Mountain, about two weeks after the defeat of Ferguson. It has always been a mystery to me as to Cloyd's destination, or that of the enemy whom he encountered. I have only understood that they met accidentally in the road, and that the enemy was composed of the enemies in the neighborhood, and of the Bryants, of Kentucky, some of whom were killed in the fight.

If Ferguson was Cloyd's object, he was too weak to effect anything, and besides, Lord Cornwallis, with the British army, lay directly in the route between them. My convictions are so clear on this point I have no fear that General Preston can render my statement doubtful. He proposes, too, to invalidate the testimony of Moses Shelby. I will, for your own satisfaction, give you a short sketch of his history. Moses was in his nineteenth year when he left his father's house to join the expedition against Ferguson and had never before, to my knowledge, been more than forty miles from home. It is well known that our march was too rapid for a youth of that age to trespass in any manner, the army having marched two or three hundred miles, and fought the battle in twelve days, three of which we were detained on the road from different causes. Moses was severely wounded at the Mountain, and the bone of one thigh being fractured, he could be carried but a short distance from the battle-ground, where he lay on his back nearly three months, and was only able to ride out a few days before General Morgan came up into the district of Ninety-Six. He joined Morgan but a day or two before the battle of the Cowpens, on the 17th of January, 1781. Here he was wounded more severely than at the Mountain, and lay, until March or April, under the hands of a surgeon. When Colonel Clarke, of Georgia, came on with his followers to commence the siege of Augusta, his wounds were still sore and open, but at the warm solicitations of Clarke, Moses joined the expedition, and was appointed Captain of horse. It is well known that the siege lasted until May or June following, in which Moses was actively engaged, and Clarke asserted to many that he made several charges on the enemy, who sallied during the siege, which would have done honor to Count Pulaski. Moses returned home shortly after the siege, and never crossed the mountains again during the war. The next year, 1782, he, with other adventurers, went to the new settlements, then forming where Nashville now stands, where he continued off and on until he married, two or three years afterwards. As the settlements progressed down the Cumberland, he was always among the foremost of the pioneers. He finally settled in what is now called Livingston County, Kentucky, where at the unanimous solicitation of the inhabitants, he was appointed colonel of the new county, about the year 1793. He had the command for a number of years. And after the acquisition of Louisiana, he removed to that territory, and now resides on the west side of the Mississippi, two miles below New Madrid, covered with the scars of thirteen deep wounds, received in defence of his country, for which he is too proud to receive a pension, always disdaining to apply for one. In his youth he was of a warm and ardent disposition, always ready to risk his life for a friend, and profuse of his property (of which he had a considerable inheritance), even to a fault. It would exceed the bounds of a letter to give you a statement of the many hair-breadth escapes and imminent dangers through which he passed. Soon after his marriage, he became impressed with religious sentiments, joined the Methodist Church, liberated his slaves, and, so far as I know and believe, has always supported a good character in that county.

It is possible, while at the South, in 1780-81, from his ardent disposition and the prevailing excitement of the times, that he may in some cases have acted imprudently. The war between the Whigs and Tories was carried on with the utmost rancor and malice, each endeavoring to do the greatest injury to the other.

Colonel Willoughby, whose affidavit has been published, swears to no point. He lived three hundred miles from the scene of action, and his information may have been very erroneous.

If, however, General Preston proves apparently anything more, he shall be answered.

I have made this hasty sketch for your own satisfaction.

I remain, dear Sir, very respectfully, your friend,

ISAAC SHELBY.

After their exchanges of letters in 1810, Shelby and Sevier, throwing conventional modesty to the winds, prepared a joint memorial to the General Assembly of North Carolina. This was presented by the Senator from Surry, Joseph Winston, on December 15, 1812, of which the following record is found:

Mr. Winston presented the memorial of Issac (sic) Shelby and John Sevier, setting forth that in consideration of public services rendered during our revolutionary war, and particularly for their conduct at the battle of King's Mountain, the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, in the year 1781, did vote each of the memorialists an elegant sword and pair of pistols, which they have not heretofore applied for or received; and they pray that this testimonial of the approbation of the state for their conduct be now complied with. This memorial being read, was referred to the committee of Propositions and Grievances, and sent to the House of Commons.[37]

The matter was later referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Porter and W. W. Jones on the part of the House, and Messrs. Atkinson and Gaston on the part of the Senate. On December 22, 1812, Mr. Gaston submitted an extended report after investigation, in which it is stated:

> Your committee find, upon an examination of the journal of the House of Commons, that the proposed address obtained the approbation and concurrence of the house; but they do not find any determination relative to the second resolution of the Senate, nor any minute that such resolution had been received by them. Your committee, however, have been informed, and so believe, that the House of Commons did concur with the Senate in this latter resolution, as well as in that for presenting to their patriots and heroes the thanks of the Legislature.[38]

In order to pay what Gaston describes as "the long procrastinated debt of gratitude and honor," the House and Senate unanimously passed the following:—

> Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to procure three elegant swords, such as in his estimation is (sic) not unworthy of North Carolina to bestow, on those who have distinguished claims on the gratitude of her citizens; and that he cause them severally to be presented, in the name of this State, to General Isaac Shelby, of Kentucky, General John Sevier of Tennessee, and Colonel Joseph Winston of this State, the three surviving chiefs of the gallant band who fought and conquered at King's Mountain, on the memorable 7th of October, 1780.[39]

In carrying out the resolution, Governor William Hawkins enlisted the services of the Hon. James Turner, at that time representing North Carolina in the United States Senate. At the instance of Mr. Turner, the swords were purchased in New York by Mr. Robert Walker of Petersburg, assisted by Colonel Swift. The swords thus procured, according to instruction, were "in point of elegance inferior to none that can be procured." The sword presented to Shelby, with which the others were identical save for name, bore upon [38]Senate Journal. It seems extraordinary that a man of Gaston's legislative experience should have omitted to examine the original manuscript of the Senate resolution of February 11, 1781, which would have resolved all his doubts.

[39]It is a source of lasting regret that another regrettable oversight was made at this time. A fourth leader in the King's Mountain campaign whose name was included in the original resolution, was Lieutenant Colonel Hambright, of Lincoln County, who survived until March, 1817. Grave injustice was done, in that no sword was presented to Lieutenant Colonel Hambright in 1813.

one side of the hilt the inscription: "King's Mountain—October 7, 1780," upon the other: "State of North Carolina to Colonel Isaac Shelby." Writing to Governor Hawkins from Warren County on September 19, 1813, the Hon. James Turner says concerning these swords: "The one for Col. Shelby was forwarded through the politeness if Mr. Clay, the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The one for Col. Savier (sic) was delivered to him by myself (he being in Washington). The one for Col. Winston was forwarded to him by Mr. Yancey, one of the members of Congress from this State. The letters of the Gentlemen was (sic) delivered and forwarded by the same Gentlemen who took charge of the swords."[40]

The following letter, just referred to, was sent to Isaac Shelby, then Governor of Kentucky, by Governor William Hawkins of North Carolina.[41]

Executive Office, N. C.

Raleigh 17th, July 1813.

Sir, In compliance with a resolution of the General Assembly of this State passed at their last Session I have the honor of tendering you the sword which this letter accompanies as a testimony of the distinguished claim you have on the gratitude of the State for your gallantry in achieving with your brothers in arms the glorious victory over the British forces commanded by Colo. Ferguson at the battle of King's Mountain on the memorable 7th of October 1780. This tribute of respect though bestowed at a protracted period, will not be considered the less honorable on that account when you are informed that it is in unison with a resolution of the General Assembly passed in the year 1781, which from some cause not well ascertained, it is to be regretted was not complied with.

Permit me Sir, to make you an expression of the high gratification felt by me at being the favored instrument to present to you in the name of the State of North Carolina, this testimonial of gratitude—this meed of valour, and to remark, that contending as we are at the present time with the same foe for our just rights the pleasing hope may be entertained that the valorous deeds of the heroes of our

I beg you to accept an assurance of the great consideration and respect with which,

This recognition on the part of North Carolina, fitly enough, came with dramatic emphasis at a moment of crisis in the career of Governor Shelby and of the State of Kentucky. In his memorable oration, delivered at Lexington, Kentucky, on August 15, 1826, the Hon. William Taylor Barry thus described the event:

Colonel Shelby was at his residence in Lincoln County, enjoying in affluence, the sweets of domestic life, when he was again called upon to assume the helm of State. At the advanced age of 63, had he wanted an apology, this was an ample one; but his mind was characterized by constancy and invincible firmness. He saw his beloved country, for whose independence he had fought in his youth, again in imminent danger, assailed by the same inveterate foe. The fire of patriotism rekindled in his bosom, he did not hesitate, but abandoning the allurements of ease, and listening only to the voice of honor, we see him again with youthful ardour, entering upon the executive duties, boldly hazarding his reputation in the contingencies of a war, the glorious results of which were yet in the womb of time. The volunteers from Kentucky who had gone forth to battle, notwithstanding the bravery and good conduct of their officers, had met with sad reverses. The dreadful defeats at the River Raisin, and the Rapids of the Miami, had deprived our State of many gallant and patriotic citizens, and filled the country with mourning; the cruelties practised by the savage allies of England, and countenanced by the British officers, was the cause of deep and powerful excitement; the public indignation was aroused and our militia, anxious to revenge their slaughtered countrymen, were impatient to be led to battle. Shelby thought the time had arrived to put an end to the contest in that quarter, and resolved to take the field in person. As he was preparing for the campaign, a happy incident occurred. The delivery of the sword voted him by the Legislature of North Carolina in 1781, had, from some cause, been delayed, and was handed to him just in time to be used in acquiring fresh laurels. Proud emblem of victory—glorious remembrancer of the gallantry and heroism of two wars.[43]

In the march to Lake Erie and Canada, the famous hero of the Revolution not without deep emotions of pride and religious fervor, "wore upon his thigh a sword just presented to him by Henry Clay, in the name of the State of North Carolina, in testimony of appreciation of his services in the old war for independence."[44]

With the sword was tendered the following letter to Shelby from Henry Clay:

Lexington, 22d August, 1813.

My dear Sir,—I have seen by the public prints that you intend leading a detachment from this state. As you will want a sword, I have the pleasure to inform you that I am charged by Governor Turner and Mr. Macon with delivering to you that which the State of North Carolina voted you in testimony of the sense it entertained of your conduct at King's Mountain. I would take it with me to Frankfort, in order that I might personally execute the commission and at the same time have the gratification of seeing you, if I were not excessively oppressed with fatigue. I shall not fail, however, to avail myself of the first safe conveyance, and if any should offer to you, I will thank you to inform me. May it acquire additional lustre in the patriotic and hazardous enterprise in which you are embarking!

Your friend,

H. Clay.

The bearer of the letter and the sword was a common friend, William T. Barry, quoted above, who delivered them to Governor Shelby at Frankfort.

The venerable soldier, with his characteristic energy once again taking the field in defense of the liberties of his country, in acknowledgment of the gift of North Carolina wrote the following interesting letter, hitherto unpublished, to the Governor of North Carolina.

Sir, On the 23d inst. I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 17th ulto. tendering to me, a Sword which accompanied it, bestowed by North Carolina as a testimony of the flattering sentiments which she entertained in relation to my conduct in the affair of the 7th of October 1780 on King's Mountain.

Engaged as my beloved country then was in a struggle for every thing dear to man, she had a right to expect the zealous exertions of her citizens in her behalf. Devoted to the cause of my country, impelled by a high sense of the obligations, I owed her, and by an utter aversion to the tyranny which was endeavouring to oppress her, I freely participated in those exertions which lead to, & that conflict which terminated so favorable to our arms, & evidently gave a favorable turn to the Revolutionary War, and in relation to which the Legislature of North Carolina have been pleased to express themselves in a manner the most flattering to my feelings.

If the freeborn sons of America wanted any stimulus to draw them forth in defence of her rights, other than a conviction that upon their exertions depended the continuance of those rights—it might be found in the heartfelt satisfaction derived from the consolation of having meritted and received the applause of a grateful [country] for the toils and dangers encountered in her behalf.

Having lived ten years of the happiest part of my life in North Carolina and having received repeated marks of the partiality of my fellow citizens in that Government during my residence amongst them, I have ever entertained the warmest feelings of fraternal affection. and good will for them. And I now accept with veneration & respect this honorable pledge of a continuance of their affection.

With considerations of high respect and Esteem
I have the honor to be
Most respectfully
Your Ob Servant

Isaac Shelby.

William Hawkins
Governor of North Carolina.[45]

The battle of King's Mountain was decisive in its effect—shattering the plans of Cornwallis which till then appeared certain of success, and putting a full stop to the invasion of North Carolina, then well under way. Cornwallis abandoned his prepared campaign and left the State. The initiative of the borderers, the loyalty of the militia, the energy of the pursuit, the perfection of the surprise, all reinforced by ideal tactics to meet the given situation, were the controlling factors in this overwhelming victory, and pivotal contest of the Revolution. The pioneers of the Old Southwest—the independent and aggressive yeomanry of North Carolina, Virginia, and South Carolina—had risen in their might; and without the authority of blundering State governments, had created an army of frontiersmen, Indian fighters, and big game hunters which found no parallel or equal on the continent since the battle of the Great Kanawha.*

The survey of the situation as given by Shelby is interesting as coming from a participant in the events:

> This battle happened at the most gloomy and critical period of the Revolutionary War, and was the first link in the great chain of events in the South that established the independence of the United States. It was achieved by raw and undisciplined riflemen without any authority from the Government under which they lived. It completely dispirited the Tories and so much alarmed Lord Cornwallis, who then lay at Charlottstown with the British grand army that on being informed of Ferguson's total defeat and overthrow by the riflemen from the west, and that they were bearing down upon him, three thousand strong, he ordered an immediate retreat, marched all night in the utmost confusion and retrograded as far back as Winnsborough seventy or eighty miles, from whence he did not attempt to advance until reinforced by General Leslie from the Chesapeake with 2,000 men, three months afterward. In the meantime the militia of North Carolina assembled in considerable force at New Providence on the borders of South Carolina under General Davidson. General Smallwood with General Morgan's light corps, and the Maryland line advanced to the same point. General Gates with the shattered remains of his army collected at Hillsborough also came up and the new levies (?) from Virginia under General Stephens of 1,000 men came forward. At the same time, (to wit) the second or third of December, General Green came up and took the command, and thus was dispelled the dismal gloom which had pervaded the Southern States.

*Narratives of the King's Mountain campaign, which have proved of value in this research, are the accounts of General Joseph Graham (Southern Literary Messenger, September 1845), Geneal William Lenoir (Wheeler's Sketches of North Carolina, ii, 105-108) and Captain David Vance (Greensboro, N. C., edited by D. L. Schenck, 1891).

Following the battle of King's Mountain, the patriot force hanged nine Tory prisoners. This act has been severely condemned; but it is scarcely to be doubted that nothing short of such drastic action would have had a decisively deterrent effect upon future Tory murderings and depredations. Shelby's own account of this seemingly inexcusable and ruthless act is quoted here, both as a picture of the times and as a recital of Shelby's own part in the matter:

The prisoners were marched back on the trail that the army had advanced upon, as well to join the men who were left behind with weak horses and on foot, as to avoid Lord Cornwallis who they believed to be only thirty or forty miles to the North (incoherent) after meeting the footmen and took a circuitous route towards the Mountains by Gilbert town, where we met an American officer paroled from Ninety six only the day before, who informed, that he had seen eleven American citizens hung at that place within a few days past, merely for their attachment to the cause of their country. This very much exasperated the American officers, at the same time a Representative from Assembly which just set at Hillsborough came into camp and had with him the manuscript of a law, authorizing two justices within the State of North Carolina, to cause to be apprehended any citizen or loyalist who might be found in arms against his country, and if found guilty of treason to order him to immediate execution without any pleading in the case. The army with the prisoners were by this time in Rutherford County in North Carolina, a Sheriff of which, as well as several Justices of the Peace of the said County, were also in camp. Our Commander called a Council of officers to deliberate on the subject, who determined unanimously to try several of the prisoners under the aforesaid act of Assembly. The 8th day after the action they commenced trying them early in the morning beginning with the most atrocious offender first who had committed murder deliberately in cold blood, and who had otherwise murdered and destroyed the families of the Whigs, burned down houses, etc., and committed the most atrocious crimes. They continued to try them until they had condemned 36 to be hung, and at two o'clock in the night following commenced hanging them, after they had hung nine of them, three at a time, and the fourth parcel of them was just about to be turned off the scaffold it was agreed on by Sevier, Cleveland and Shelby upon a motion of the latter, that they would put a stop to any further execution, and addressed Campbell on the subject, who readily came into their views, and released the three men that were then under the gallows to be executed, one of whom informed that Tarlton would be upon us next morning, that a woman had come into camp in the evening, and gave the information to the British officers, who communicated it to the Tories. The Americans immediately all mounted their horses, and were ready to march as soon as it was light enough to see for the night was excessively dark; as soon as they could see the way they started directly toward the mountains, got into level valley that lead immediately toward the North. We had not marched a mile before DePeyster rode up to Col. Shelby and enquired "which way was that they were going," to which the Col. replied, that they were going up into their native element, the mountains. When DePeyster cried out, "you smell a rat," Shelby replied that they knew all about it. It commenced raining just after daylight, and was I believe, the wettest day I have even seen since; so heavy was the rain that many parts of the valley became waist deep. The Americans continued their march until two o'clock that night, although it was dark as pitch, and the road could be seen by the continued flashes of lightning, when they came to the Catawba River which they supposed to be rising very fast from the quantity of rain that had fallen. The prisoners were forced into the water in a column of six deep as they usually marched, and ordered to hold fast to each other as the current was very strong. Our march that day and night was 36 miles and the river next morning had risen 10 feet. This escape excited feelings of the deepest gratitude in the breasts of the Americans, after they had reached a place of safety. It was a well known fact to all men who lived in that day, that the execution of these nine prisoners, put a stop to the hanging of any more American citizens at Camden and Ninety-six, where several hundred persons had been previously executed at those two places, purely for their attachment to the American cause. The prisoners taken at King's Mountain were given up by the Mountaineers to the militia assembled at Moravian Town to receive them, and afterwards marched to Salisbury where they were crowded into the jail and other houses prepared to receive them.

No account with any pretensions, either to accuracy or consecutiveness, has ever been given of the relation of Shelby, Sevier and the western leaders, to the cause of the Revolution subsequent to the Battle of King's Mountain. The histories teem with inaccuracies and inexplicable confusions of names and dates. The recent discovery of letters and documents, bearing on this period, make it possible for me to give for the first time, I believe, a reliable and consistent account of the rolé played by Shelby and some of the other frontier leaders in the closing years of the Revolution.

There is an interesting revelation of vanity in Shelby's Autobiography, in which he claims the credit, usually ascribed to General Nathaniel Greene, for the plan of campaign which eventuated in Morgan's defeat of Tarleton. This passage gives us an account also of Shelby's movements, following the delivery of the prisoners taken at King's Mountain to the authorities at Salem:

When the British had gotten possession of the posts of Ninety Six and Augusta, they had an open communication with the Southern Indians, and furnished them with arms and ammunition by which means the Cherokees were enabled to wage a constant war against the new settlements forming on the western waters of North Carolina. Col. Shelby had long viewed this evil without being able to devise any means to prevent it. But after the prisoners taken at King's Mountain were disposed of at Moravian town, he set out from there to go to Headquarters, to solicit the Commander-in-Chief to send Gen. Morgan with his light troops into the upper country, to subdue those two posts. He knew from his own knowledge that Morgan would be strongly reinforced by the mountain men, and many others who had left their homes in the upper parts of Georgia and South Carolina rather than submit to the enemy. He found headquarters at a place called New Providence on the border of South Carolina, and under the command of Maj. Gen. Smallwood. He first communicated the object of his visit to camp to Gen. Morgan who seemed highly pleased and gratified at the suggestions made to him, readily entered into his views, saw at once the probable chance of success and said it was just what he had wanted, a separate command. He also made these suggestions to Gen. Smallwood, thinking he might possibly order Morgan on but although he highly approved the measure, he would not take upon himself the responsibility, as Gen. Gates would be in himself in a few days, and advised him to wait his arrival. He waited in camp upwards of a fortnight, when it was announced that Gen. Gates was near at hand. He set out next morning with six or eight officers to go to him and meet him about seven miles from camp with the remains of his army collected at Hillsborough. On Gates' arrival at camp he invited Shelby to dine with him the next day. He was proud to have an opportunity to make his communications, and went before the usual hour.

Gen. Gates gave him a cordial reception and invited him in. Col. Shelby replied that he had some important communications to make to him, that he had come early for that purpose, and would be glad if he would afford him an opportunity to do so. Gates pointing to a log a few rods from his door proposed to sit down on it. Before he heard all that Shelby had to say, he saw the practicability and importance of the measure proposed and observed, that if the board of war of North Carolina then sitting at Charlottstown would aid him with five hundred militia, he would send Morgan up with his light corps immediately. Gen. Gates was accordingly on horseback next morning before sunrise, and as he passed with his guards by Davidson's marked where Shelby lodged; he joined him, and they arrived early at Charlotte. Gates opened the subject to the board of war—which consisted of Alexander Martin alone (who was then or shortly after Governor of the State) who very soon saw the propriety of the measure and requested Shelby to stay until next morning, and take some communications to the Northern counties of the State, which was on his way home where the men must be raised, which he did; for the counties around Charlotte had been drained to form the camp at New Providence which then opposed the enemy. Col. Shelby set out the next morning, from Charlotte, which was about the 2d or 3d of December, 1780, and met Gen. Green about three miles from town, going forward to take command of the Southern army. Shelby had no idea that Tarlton, or any force would be sent up to oppose Morgan in that distant upper county, he only contemplated the reduction of the two posts, Ninety Six and Augusta. And if Gen. Green is entitled to any credit for the defeat of Tarlton by Morgan, it is merely that he permitted the enterprise to go on which led to that event, and which had been planned and ordered by Gen. Gates (on the suggestion of Shelby before he was superseded, and before Green took the command) Col. Shelby was at a loss to determine why so much time had elapsed from Green's taking the command on the 17th of January unless it was owing to the tardiness of the militia orders by the board of war as before stated, to John Morgan, or to the scarcity of provisions. For he can say of his own knowledge that there was never more than two days provisions at any one time while he stayed in the camp near three weeks; the country at that time being drained of supplies.

The value which was universally set upon the services of the over-mountain men and their leaders, Shelby and Sevier, following the overwhelming victory of King's Mountain is fully attested in documents of the period. The following letter, taken in conjunction with the above-quoted passage from Shelby's Autobiography, is significant:

Camp New Providence, 23d November, 1780.

Sir: Colo. Shelby have been in camp for some time, waiting to lend his Aid, should anything go on offensive, but apprehending not much will be done this winter. And his domestick business call for him, and he having no command, is now on his way home. I have been speaking to him to raise about three hundred good rifle men this winter for the campaign, & join me early in the spring. He says he would willingly undertake it, provided he had a sanction for it. How far the Assembly of North Carolina would be disposed to countenance such a thing I don't know, but I assure you that a Number of such men would be a valuable Corps when annex'd to the Light Infantry, which must be made equal if not superior to Tarlton's Legion before this country can be defended. If you think proper to countenance a matter of this kind, you'll be kind enough to signify your approbation to Colo. Shelby and point out the mode.

I have the Honor to be, with much
DANL. MORGAN.

The Honble. M. Genl. Gates.

The greatest contemporary tribute to the leaders of the King's Mountain campaign, showing the high estimation in which their services were held and the need generally felt for the assistance to the American cause they could render, is found in the following action taken by the North Carolina Assembly at Halifax on February 13, 1781:

Resolved, That Colonel Isaac Shelby of Sullivan County and John Sevier, Esqr., of Washington County, be informed by this Resolve being communicated to them that the General Assembly of this State are feelingly impressed with the very generous and patriotic services rendered by the Inhabitants of the said Counties, to which their influence had in great degree contributed and earnestly urge that they would press a continuance of the same active exertion; that the State of the Country is such as to call forth the utmost powers immediately in order to preserve its freedom and Independence, and that we may by the assistance of our friends in Virginia, as they have occasionally by us, as emergencies induced them, availed of it, we suggest our wishes that Colonel Arthur Campbell and Colonel William Preston of Virginia, thro' the Gentlemen mentioned, may be informed that their spirited conduct heretofore in favor of the Southern States affords us the most perfect assurance that they will make every active and effectual exertion at the present critical moment in favor of this State.

At this same time, Ex-Governor Richard Caswell, an intimate acquaintance of Isaac Shelby, "depicted to him the melancholy circumstances of his own State. The Tories were in motion all over North Carolina, and their footsteps were marked with blood, and their path was indicated by the most desolating devastations. Governor Caswell conjured him to turn to the relief of his distressed country."[46] The Continental Congress, through their laudatory resolution of November 15, 1780, and the general officers of the American army, including Gates, Greene and Morgan, having ascertained the military value of the fighting frontiersmen, the inevitable result was that General Greene, on January 30, 1781, wrote to "the famous Colonel William Campbell," reminding him of the glory he had already acquired, and urging him "to bring, without loss of time, a thousand good volunteers from over the mountains."[47] The difficulties which the frontiersmen were experiencing with the Indians at this period, in a succession of campaigns, put out of the question the sending of any large force to assist Greene in his North Carolina campaign. No sooner had Sevier returned from the King's Mountain campaign than he was called upon to lead three hundred horsemen from Watauga, in conjunction with three hundred from Sullivan County, and one hundred from Washington County, Virginia—the whole under the command of Colonel Arthur Campbell, County-Lieutenant of Washington County, against the Cherokees. Upon the return of Colonel Campbell from this expedition, which was entirely successful, the first of January, 1781, he immediately communicated with General Nathaniel Greene, the Commander of the Southern Department, who accordingly, on February 6, 1781, appointed Arthur Campbell, William

Preston, William Christian and Joseph Martin, of Virginia, and Robert Lanier, Evan Shelby, Joseph Williams and John Sevier, of North Carolina, commissioners to meet commissioners from the Cherokees to treat on the subject of boundaries, to arrange for an exchange of prisoners and terms of peace, and to invite the Indians to appoint a commission to visit Congress.[48]

The treaty was set for March 24, 1781, at the Long Island of Holston River. On that day Colonels Campbell, Martin, Shelby and Sevier assembled there, and sent off one of the Indians captured in the recent campaign to the Indian nation proposing peace and fixing June 10th following as the date for the conference. The date was again postponed until July 20, 1781.[49] Continued depredations by the hostile Indians earlier in the year seriously hampered the Tennessee and Virginia borderers at this time; and Col. John Sevier, suspecting that "the perpetrators of this mischief came from some hostile towns in the mountain gorges," had resolved to lead an expedition against them.

In March of this year Colonels John Sevier and Isaac Shelby undertook an expedition against the Chickamauga Indians, and to assist in this undertaking 200 of the militia of Washington county joined Colonel Isaac Shelby and marched to the Big Island in the French Broad River, where the troops were rendezvoused, from which point they marched for the sources of the Mobile River, and after the third day they crossed the Tennessee river at Scitico, at which point they held a council with the friendly Indians. On the 6th day they encamped on the Hiawassee river, and on the 7th day they crossed the river and passed into the territory of the hostile Indians, Colonel Sevier with his forces, marched immediately against Vann's Towns, which he reduced to ashes, and thence to Bull Town, at the head of Chickamogga Creek. After the destruction of this town they marched to the Coosa river, where they killed a white man by the name of Clements from whom it was ascertained that he was a sergeant in the British army, and it was believed that he instigated the Indians in their depredations against the frontiers. The army then proceeded to Spring Frog Town, thence up the Coosa river to Estanola and Indian Town which they destroyed. After thus destroying the Indian towns and killing all the Indian Warriors they could find, the troops returned to Chote, where a council was held with the friendly Indians, at the conclusion of which the troops were disbanded and returned to their homes.[50]

Although neither Shelby nor Sevier could lead a force of mountain men to the relief of Greene, Captain Charles Robertson raised a company of about one hundred and fifty volunteers and took a creditable part in the battle of Guilford Courthouse on March 15, 1781.[51] With equal patriotism, Colonel William Campbell raised a company of one hundred men of the militia of Washington County, and on February 25, 1781, set out to join the militia of Botetourt and Montgomery counties, on their march to join General Greene's army. "A large number would have gone," says Arthur Campbell in a letter to Governor Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, of date February 28, 1781, "were it not for the daily apprehension of attacks from the northward and southern Indians." About March 3, Colonel Campbell with sixty followers in his immediate command, effected a junction with Greene's army; but the total number of the combined forces of William Campbell and William Preston, who reached Greene about the same time, was upwards of four hundred.[52] These forces fought with staunchness and bravery at Guilford Courthouse, fully justifying Greene's description of the "back country people" as "bold and daring in their make."[53]

Following the Battle of Guilford Courthouse, Greene devoted his attention to reducing the British posts in South Carolina and Georgia. After the fall of Augusta, on June 25, only Ninety-six remained in British hands; but Greene was foiled in his attack upon that post on June 18 and 19. From the "Camp at Bush River, in the District of Ninety-six, June 22, 1781," Greene once more appealed for aid to the Watauga riflemen in a letter to Isaac Shelby, hitherto unpublished. In this important letter he says:

We have been upon the eve of reducing all the enemies interior posts in South Carolina and Georgia. Ninety-Six was the last and four days more would have completed its reduction, when, unfortunately, we were compelled to raise the siege, the enemy having been reinforced at Charlestown. Lord Rawdon marched out in force and is now in our neighborhood. To secure the advantages of our past success it is necessary we should drive the enemy into the lower country. To enable us to effect this I beg you to march to our assistance a thousand good riflemen, well armed and equipped fit for action. If you can join us in a few days with such a force you will render an important service to the public in general, to the State of South Carolina in particular, and lay me under very particular obligations. I feel myself deeply interested in this application.

At the time when this letter reached Shelby, the military leaders of Virginia and Tennessee were busily concerned in the negotiations for peace with the Cherokees. Isaac Shelby attended the treaty at the Long Island of Holston from July 20 to July 29, 1781. The despatches from the Commissioners to General Greene, reporting the results of this treaty, were entrusted to Shelby for delivery, as it was known that he had promised General Greene to raise a force and march to his aid. The following letter, hitherto unpublished in any history, exhibits in detail the efforts made by Shelby and Sevier to raise and to march a force to coöperate with Greene.

Camp on Wattauga Washington County
North Carolina 3d August 1781.

Hond. Sir: In answer to your request of the 22d June last I rote you by the Express, that I should March by the 15th July with what force cou'd be rais'd in this quarter, but the Cherokee Treaty not being over found it impracticable to draw any force from here untill that important Business (to this frontier) was finally ratified, which was done the 29th July, and immediately every step taken to reinforce you; about 700 good riflemen well mounted were now in motion toward you & should have been down in as short a time as possible but an Express arrived in camp last night from General Pickens that informed us of the Enemys retreat to Orangeburg and perhaps to Charles Town, that distance being so very great for us, the warm season of the year & the men not prepared for so long a Tower, had induced Col. Severe of this county and myself from proceeding on our march, until one hear farther accounts from that quarter tho the men are ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march on the shortest notice, and as our country is now in a state of peace and tranquility, have no doubt but we can furnish you with a large proportion of good men from here whenever you may find necessary to require us.

I have the honour to be with. respect

After Shelby and Sevier concluded not to march, Shelby returned the despatches for Greene, mentioned above, to the Commissioners who had negotiated the treaty with the Cherokees.[55] Greene had been greatly depressed by the failure of Shelby and Sevier to march their seven hundred riflemen to his assistance; and throughout July he was frequently heard to exclaim: "What can detain Shelby and Sevier?"[56] Writing to Colonel Lee from Camden on August 25, Greene despondently says: "We are thus far on our way to join Colonel Henderson, but the tardiness with which everybody moves who was expected to join us, almost makes me repent that I have put the troops in motion. Near two hundred of the North Carolina Regulars, who ought to have been here four days past, are not likely to be here for four or five to come. Colonel Shelby, I believe, had gone back, if he ever set out, which I much doubt. General Pickens had not been heard of, and I fear will not have it in his power to bring any considerable reinforcements; nor do I expect Lieutenant-Colonel Henderson will be able to do much more. The State troops I am told (are) all getting sickly, as is the North Carolina Regulars. Not more than one-half the militia from North Carolina are arrived, and the whole that are here don't exceed four hundred. You know I never despair, nor shrink at difficulties, but our prospects are not flattering."[57]

Greene continued to rely upon receiving reinforcements from Watauga; and after his victory at Eutaw Springs, he despatched to Shelby the following letter, which was to have momentous consequences. This letter was not received by Shelby before the last of September or first of October, as it "came through Virginia, was found in Henry County by a neighbor, and brought out at his leisure."

Head Quarters,
High Hills of Santee
Sept. 16, 1781.

DEAR SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform you that we had an action with the British Army on the 8th in which we were victorious. We took 500 prisoners and killed and wounded a much greater number. We also took near 1000 stand of arms, and have driven the enemy near to the gates of Charleston. I have also the pleasure to inform you that, a large French fleet of nearly thirty sail of the line, has arrived in the Chessepeak bay, with a considerable number of land forces; all of which are to be employed against Lord Cornwallis, who it is suspected will endeavor to make good his retreat through North Carolina to Charleston. To prevent which I beg you to bring out as many riflemen as you can, and as soon as possible. You will march them to Charlotte, and inform me the moment you set out, and of your arrival.

If we can intercept his lordship it will put a finishing stroke to the war in the Southern states.

Should I get any intelligence which may change the face of matters I will advise you. I am with esteem and regard, your most obedient & humble Servant, NATH. GREEN.

Col. Shelby, back parts of North Carolina.[58]

[57]H. Lee: Campaign of 1781 in the Carolinas (1824), 455-6.

[58]Letter of Isaac Shelby to C. S. Todd, June 28, 1822. This letter was first given publicity by Shelby in his Memoir because of the unwarranted charge brought by Judge Johnson in his biography of Greene (ii, 258) against Sevier and Shelby for having "deserted" Greene.

Upon the receipt of this letter, Shelby immediately communicated its contents by express to Sevier, who lived fifty miles away, and proposed a rendezvous of their men early in October. In making the enlistments, Shelby assured the volunteers that they should not be absent from their families for more than sixty days.

I made great exertions, and collected the men in a few days thereafter, many of them had not received more than 24 hours notice and lived more than 100 miles from the place of rendezvous—but were willing to go as the call was made for a special purpose—to wit, to intercept Lord Cornwallis who it was suspected would endeavor to make good his retreat through N. Carolina to Charleston and Gen. Green thought and so did I that if we could intercept him, it would put an end to the war in the S. states. To effect this important object, the people on the western waters were induced to volunteer their services—it was for this purpose that they were prevailed upon to leave their homes 500 miles from the scene of operations to defend a Maritime district of country surrounded with a dense population and in comparative quiet, while their own firesides were daily menaced by the Chicamauga Indians, who as you know had declared perpetual war against the whites and could never be induced to make peace. I was far advanced on my road when I received vague information of the surrender of Cornwallis in Virginia and hesitated whether to proceed. But as the men appeared to be willing to serve out a tour of duty which at the time of their entering the service I repeatedly assured them should not exceed 60 days absence from their homes, I proceeded on more leisurely to Green, who observed to me that such a body of horse could not remain in the vicinity of his camp on account of the scarcity of forage and requested me to serve out the tour with Marion, to which I consented, however, with some reluctance as the men would be drawn 70 or 80 miles further from their homes.[59]

Shelby quickly raised upwards of five hundred mounted riflemen; and Sevier with equal despatch raised two hundred mounted riflemen in Washington County. These two bodies, totalling some seven hundred, joined Marion at his camp on the Santee. The hint was given to Marion that "if he would keep them he must keep them busy."[60]

It was with considerable reluctance that Shelby and Sevier

[60]Greene Mss., cited in Greene's Greene, iii, 419.

consented to being attached to Marion's command. "Their men were called out upon a pressing emergency which no longer existed. They had been, moreover, enrolled only sixty days. Much of that time had already expired, and the contemplated service under Marion would take them still further from their distant homes. Besides Shelby was a member of the General Assembly of North Carolina, from Sullivan County, and its session at Salem took place early in December."[61]

Almost at once they were engaged in very active service. The account of the ensuing events is contained in Shelby's Autobiography, here reproduced as written:

The enemies main Southern army, it was said, lay at that time near a place called Fergusson's Swamp on the great road bearing directly to Charleston. Gen'l Marion received information several weaks after our arrival at his camp that several hundred Hessians at a British Post near Monk's Corner, eight or ten miles below the enemies main army were in a state of mutiny, and would surrender the post to any considerable American force that might appear before it; and consulted his principal officers on the propriety of surprising it, which was soon determined on, and Shelby and Sevier solicited a command in it. Marion accordingly moved down eight or ten miles, and crossed over to the South side of the Santee River, from whence he made a detachment of five or six hundred men to surprise the post, the command of which was given to Colonel Mayhem. The detachment consisted of Shelby's mounted riflemen with Mayhem's Dragoons, about one hundred and eighty, and about twenty or thirty lowland mounted militia, the command of the whole was given to Colonel Mayhem. They took up their march early in the morning, and traveled fast through the woods until late in the evening of the second day, when they struck the great road leading to Charleston, about two miles below the enemy's post, which they intended to surprise. They lay upon their arms all night across the road with a design to intercept the Hessians in case the enemy had got notice of our approach and had ordered them down to Charleston before morning. In the course of the night which was as dark as pitch an orderly Sergeant rode into the line amongst us, and was taken prisoner. No material papers were found upon him before he made his escape except a pocket book which contained the strength of the enemy's main army and their number then on the sick list, which was very great.

[61] Ramsey: Annals of Tennessee, 254.

As soon as daylight appeared, we advanced to the British Post, and arrived there before sunrise. Col. Mayhem sent in one of his confidential officers with peremptory demand for a surrender of the garrison, who in a few minutes returned and reported that the officer commanding was determined to defend the post to the last extremity. Col. Shelby then proposed that he would go in himself and make another effort to obtain a surrender, which Mayhem readily consented to. Upon his approach he discovered a gap in the Abbaties, through which he rode up close to the building, when an officer opened one leaf of a long folding door. Col. Shelby addressed him in these words, "Will you be so mad as to suffer us to storm your works, if you do rest assured that every soul of you will be put to the sword, for there was several hundred men at hand that would soon be in with their tomahawks upon them"; he then inquired if they had any artillery. Shelby replied, "that they had guns that would blow them to pieces in a minute." Upon which the officer replied, "I suppose I must give up." Mayhem seeing the door thrown wide open, and Shelby ascend the high steps to the door, immediately advanced with his dragoons, and formed on the right. It was not until this moment we discovered another strong British Fort that stood five or six hundred yards to the East, and this is the first knowledge we had of that post, the garrison of which immediately marched out, about one hundred infantry and forty or fifty cavalry came around the North Angle of the fort all apparently with a design to attack us; they however soon halted as we stood firm and prepared to meet them. We took a hundred and fifty prisoners, all of them able to have fought from the windows of the house, or from behind Abbaties. Ninety of them were able to stand a march to Marion's camp that day which was near sixty miles; and we paroled the remainder most of whom appeared to have been sick, and unable to stand so hard a march. Information soon reached Marion's camp that the post had been burnt down immediately on our leaving it; but it was always the opinion of Col. Shelby that the enemy had abandoned it, and burnt it themselves, for Mayhem and Shelby were the two last men that left the place, and at that time there was not the least sign of fire or smoke about it. This it is most probable they would do, as they had previously destroyed, and burned down almost every building in that part of the country. This post was an immense brick building, calculated to hold a thousand men, and said to have been built by Sir John Gollitin a century before that period as well for defense as comfort; and was well enclosed by a strong abbaties. In it were found, besides the prisoners three or four hundred stand of arms, and as many new blankets. The American detachment left this post between nine and ten o'clock of the same day, and arrived at Marion's camp the night following at three o'clock. Gen. Stewart who commanded the Enemy's main army, eight or ten miles above made great efforts to intercept us on our return. And it was announced to Marion before sunrise next morning that the whole British army was in the old field about three miles off at the outer end of the causeway that led into his camp. Shelby was immediately ordered out with the mountain men to meet him at the edge of the swamp, to attack the enemy if he attempted to advance and retreat at his own discretion, to where Marion would have his whole force drawn up to sustain him at an old field. Shortly after his arrival at the edge of the open plain, he observed two British officers ride up to a house equidistant between the lines, after they retired he rode to the house to know what inquiries they had made; a man told him that they had asked him when the Americans detachment had got in, what was their force, and of what troops it was composed; he replied that the detachment had come in just before day, that he had supposed as they went out they were six or eight hundred strong; and were composed chiefly of Shelby's and Sevier's mounted men, with Mayhem's Dragoons. The enemy then being in the edge of the woods, silently withdrew out of sight, and retreated back in the utmost disorder and confusion. A small party sent out to reconnoiter the enemy, reported that many of them had thrown away their knapsacks, guns and canteens. A few days afterwards Gen'l. Marion received intelligence that the British commander had retreated with his whole force to Charleston. Marion's sole design in moving from the camp when the mountain men first joined him, and crossing the Santee River below, was to get within striking distance of the before mentioned post, to make the said detachment, and be able to protect and support them on their retreat if hard pushed by the enemy. After this the enemy kept so within their lines that little or no blood was spilt, and all active movements appearing to be at an end, Shelby made application to Gen'l Marion for leave of absence to go to the Assembly of North Carolina, of which he was a member, and which was to meet about that time at Salem, and where he had private business of his own of the first importance. The mountain men had then but a day or two to stay, to complete their tour of duty, of sixty days, and he verily believes that they did serve it out, as he never heard to the contrary.[62]

[62]In a conversation with C. S. Todd, May 16, 1826, Shelby said concerning the affair at Monk's Corner:

"When we arrived on parade with the detachment against the British post near Monk's Corner, I did not know who was to command but I expected I was—as I had been informed that Marion was only a Lt.-Col. When I understood the command had been assigned to Marion I made objections and refused to march, as I was the superior officer. The detachment stood still until Marion himself came from a distance of one-half mile who entreated me in the most friendly language to yield to the arrangement he had made. That Marion was well acquainted with the country through which we were to pass and with the immediate neighborhood of the post we were to attack. I submitted to his request because I was to stay but a short time in camp and I thought Marion to be much of a gentleman and so he treated me. Indeed, throughout the expedition he gave me no orders but consulted me on all occasions. These mountaineers were poor men who lived by keeping stock in the range beyond the mountains, they were volunteers and neither expected nor received any compensation

XII

On November 25, having virtually filled out their term of enlistment, the mountaineers set off homeward in a deep snow. About November 28th, Shelby applied to Marion for leave of absence to attend the session of the Assembly of North Carolina, which was to meet at the Moravian Town (Salem). Shelby had been elected a member of the legislature from Sullivan County and was charged with a "Memorial to be laid before that body in relation to a subject of deep importance." According to Shelby's own statement, General Marion "readily granted my request and addressed a letter by me to General Green which I was permitted to see directed to him at the High Hills of Santee where he expected General Green was still encamped. In this letter I have a distinct recollection that he spoke in the highest terms of the conduct of the mountaineers and gave me my full share of the credit for the capture of the British Post."[63]

Shelby attended the North Carolina Assembly at Salem in December, 1781, which adjourned without action. On returning to Holston, as stated by Draper, Shelby "was engaged during the spring in preparing for an expedition against the Chickamauga band of Cherokees, and the hostile Creeks at the sources of the Mobile, in which enterprise he was to have been joined by two hundred men from Washington County, Virginia; but on account of the poverty of that State, the authorities discouraged the scheme, and reaching Big Creek, thirty miles below Long Island of Holston, the expedition was relinquished."[64] Having again been elected a member of the North Carolina Assembly, Shelby attended the session at except liquidated certificates worth 2S. in the pound. Gen. Greene had no right nor ought to have expected to command their services. For myself for the whole services of 1780 and 1781 both in camp and in the assembly I received a liquidation certificate which my agent in that county after my removal to Kentucky sold for six yards of Middling Broadcloth and I gave one coat of it to the person who brought it out to me—indeed I was proud of receiving that."

Hillsborough in April, 1782.[65] At this session he took an active part in the proceedings, and was engaged busily on important committees. At this session was passed the liberal "Act for the relief of the Officers and Soldiers in the Continental line, etc.," rewarding the revolutionary soldiers for their patriotic services—to every soldier who should continue in the ranks until the end of the war 640 acres of land; to every officer a larger quantity according to his rank, a colonel receiving 7,200 and a brigadier 12,000 acres; and to General Greene 25,000 acres. Section VIII of this act reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That Absalom Tatom, Isaac Shelby, and Anthony Bledsoe, Esquires, or any two of them, are appointed commissioners in behalf of the State, to examine and superintend the laying off the land in one or more tracts allotted to the officers and soldiers, and they shall be accompanied by one or more agents, whom the officers may appoint, to assist in the business; and in case any commissioner so appointed shall die, or refuse to act his Excellency the Governor shall fill up the vacancy.[66]

Full instructions were given the commissioners by Governor Alexander Martin,[67] and, accompanied by a guard of one hundred men, they arrived at Nashborough and the Cumberland in January, 1783. Under the provisions of the act above, the commissioners were instructed to settle the preemption claims of those who had settled on the Cumberland River prior to June 1, 1780. Under conditions of grave danger from the Indians, who killed various members of the Cumberland settlements, including one of their own party, the commissioners satisfactorily concluded their task in the early spring of 1783.[68] Their visit marks the beginning of prosperity and moderate security from the Indians, for the exposed settlements along the Cumberland.

On January 13, 1783, Isaac Shelby, Joseph Martin, and John Donelson were appointed commissioners on behalf of the State of Virginia to treat with the Cherokees, Creeks and Chickasaws for peace. Shelby did not attend the treaties subsequently held with the Chickamaugas at the Long Island of Holston on July 9, 1783; and with the Chickasaws at the French Lick on November 5 and 6, 1783.[69]

In fact, more important business now occupied his attention; for in April he was married to the young woman whom he had long loved—Susanna Hart. She was the daughter of Colonel Nathaniel Hart of North Carolina, a prominent member of the Transylvania Company. Isaac Shelby courted his sweetheart at the famous fort of Boonesborough, in the neighborhood of which her father had been slain by the Indians the preceding year.[70] No doubt he wore at the time that memorable "suit of middling broadcloth," which was his recompense for his service to his country in the King's Mountain campaign. In the union of the names of Hart and Shelby, and in the associations which cluster about them, may be recognized a living symbol of the greatness of Kentucky for more than a century and a quarter.

The marriage, appropriately solemnized as the Revolution came to a triumphant close, marks the end of the era. Of Shelby's future career—as first Governor of the Commonwealth, general, eminent citizen—a new study must be projected.[71] A fitting summary of the virtues of this distinguished American, whose honored name is forever linked with the history of North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and the nation, is contained in these words of Governor James T. Morehead, in his address at Boonesborough (May 25, 1840):

"Great men," said Mr. Burke, "are the guide posts and landmarks in the State." The life of Isaac Shelby is a signal example of unblemished personal integrity and enlarged public usefulness, which may be safely imitated by all those who aspire to become benefactors of their country. Starting into active life without the aid of fortune or education, he pursued the gradations of military rank from the lieutenancy of a militia company to the command of a regiment—he rose from the humble station of a surveyor among the pioneers to the governorship of a great Commonwealth—and was distinguished in all the posts to which he was called. His mind like his body was strong and vigorous: boldness, energy, decision, were its leading characteristics. Capable of thinking for himself, he investigated every important subject that came within the range of his private or public duties, with candor and deliberation; and having formed his opinions, he followed them with unshaken firmness. He spoke and wrote as he thought—with great force and vigor— always expressing his opinions with manly frankness, and a lofty disdain of personal consequences. His manners—derived from the school in which he was brought up—were plain and simple, and commanded, without any affectation of dignity, the universal deference of his associates. He was sincere but not profuse in his professions of attachment—faithful and steadfast to his friends when those attachments were once formed. Elevating himself in the discharge of his official duties above the influence of private considerations, he sought and rewarded merit for his country's sake. If such was his character as a public man, he maintained all the relations of life with equal credit and success.

APPENDIX

The present research, dealing with the career of Isaac Shelby down to the close of the Revolution, is a fragment of a larger study, a detailed biography. In the preparation of these two papers, I have been materially assisted by my friend, Judge Samuel M. Wilson, of Lexington, Kentucky. He has placed at my disposal original and unpublished material, as well as interesting contributions to the history of Kentucky and the West which have remained hidden in inaccessible publications. I am also indebted to Mr. William R. Shelby of Grand Rapids, Michigan, and to Colonel Samuel King of Bristol, Tennessee-Virginia, for transcripts of valuable documents throwing light upon Shelby's career.

There are a few statements to be made here, which are the results of more intensive study and purport either to correct or to modify statements already made.

In regard to the parents of General Evan Shelby, to wit: Evan Shelby, Sr., and Catherine Davies, it is certain that they were natives of Wales, with a large percentage of Welsh blood. Evan and Davies are characteristic Welsh names. Those best informed in regard to the family's early history, however, believe that the name was originally Selby, and that the Shelbys were of English extraction.

The records at Upper Marlboro, the county seat of Prince George's County, Maryland, reveal many transactions in which the Shelbys figure as residents of said county prior to the creation of Frederick County (not carved out of Prince George's County until 1748). It is probable that the immigrant ancestors of the Shelby family settled in Maryland nearer 1730 than 1735. Ultimately, by the formation of Washington County, the residence of Evan Shelby, near the North Mountain, was found to be in Washington County. (See Part I, 109-110.)

The earliest surveys and grants to Evan Shelby, Senior and Junior, make it reasonably certain that the Shelbys resided continuously in Maryland from 1739 or earlier to 1771 or 1772. In particular, see Scharf's History of Western Maryland, ii, 982-6. (See Part I, 112-3.)

Isaac Shelby's mother was Letitia Cox (correctly given in Part I, p. 114, inadvertently given as "Scott" on p. 113). There is strong documentary evidence that she was born, not in Frederick Town, but somewhere in Prince George's County, Maryland. She was married to Evan Shelby probably in August, 1744.

Isaac Shelby was not the eldest son of Evan Shelby, being the second son and third child. Susannah Shelby, born about 1746, was the first born child and John Shelby, born about 1748, was the second child and eldest son. Evan Shelby brought to Virginia five sons: John, Isaac, Evan, Moses and James. A younger daughter, Catherine, was married to Captain James Thompson. (Part I, 113.)

Within recent years the remains of General Evan Shelby have been removed from his original grave and re-interred in East View Cemetery, Bristol. (Part I, 114.)

In Part I, 133, twelfth line from bottom should read (in part): " . . . it was not supposed . . ."

In Part I, 134, the last two lines should read: "opened at St. Asaph's on October 13, 1779; and again at St. Asaph's, on April 26, 1780, after various sessions at Harrodsburg and elsewhere, the court announced that its."

In Part I, 135, line 11, "1778" is a misprint for "1776."

There is good reason to believe that the "Captain I. Shelby" referred to in Clark's Memoir, is not Isaac, but James Shelby. The "J" was misread "I." At this time, Isaac Shelby was a Major, under commission from Governor Jefferson of Virginia. It is uncertain whether this James Shelby was a brother or a cousin of Isaac Shelby. (Part I, 136.)

In Part I, 141, foot-note 49, line 2, "eighty-three" is a misprint for "sixty-three."

NEGRO SOLDIERS

By Chief Justice Walter Clark

In view of the enlistment of negroes as soldiers in the present war, it may be of interest to note the part that they have taken as soldiers in our previous wars.

In the Revolutionary War there was no small number of negroes who served as soldiers. These were mostly free negroes, but no small part of them were slaves, who served, usually, but not always, as substitutes for their owners under promise of freedom at the end of the war. This promise was usually kept, but not always. An act of the Virginia Legislature passed in 1783, recites that every slave who had enlisted upon the faith of a promise of freedom from his master should be declared free accordingly, and directed the Attorney-General of that State to institute proceedings in all cases where the promise had not been complied with, and that the court on proof, should enter a decree of emancipation. It is greatly to the credit of that State that such act should have been passed.

In North Carolina it does not appear that such act was necessary, however, as the only statute is one enfranchising a certain negro, Ned Griffin, of Edgecombe, whose master, William Kitchen, had promised him his liberty on condition of service in the Continental line of this State for twelve months, which he had done, and the act declared him a free man. Laws 1784, ch. 70. Laws 1779, ch. 12, validated the freedom of all slaves who had served in the army under the promise of being free.

These negroes, whether freemen, or slaves, enlisting under a promise of freedom, did not serve in separate organizations, but in the ranks with the white soldiers. This appears in the diary of Hugh McDonald of this State, and also in other memoirs and diaries of those times.

In the first collision between the Americans and the British soldiers in Boston the leader of the popular revolt was Crispus Attucks, a free negro, who was killed by the soldiers, and whose statue today stands on the Boston Commons.

At the battle of Bunker Hill, Peter Salem, a negro slave who had volunteered on promise of freedom, behaved with conspicuous courage, and it was he who shot Major Pitcairn in reply to a summons to surrender. Bancroft says that "In the forces under Washington the free negroes had representatives in various companies and regiments, and their names are preserved on the pension list of the nation." At that time slavery existed in all the Colonies and, the draft laws covering only "free persons," no slaves were drawn except those who went on promise of freedom or as substitutes for their masters. These served usually in the ranks with the other soldiers, but it is recorded that Major Samuel Lawrence of Groton, Mass., raised a command composed entirely of free negroes. The Continental Congress passed an act forbidding the acceptance or retention of such as were "still held in bondage," and thereupon the practice obtained of conferring freedom upon those slaves who served as substitutes for their masters, or voluntarily.

Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina, on one occasion moved Congress that "all negroes be dismissed from the Continental armies." This was overwhelmingly defeated and, when later, Congress issued an order directing that negro soldiers who were slaves should be rejected, General Washington replied that the negroes "are very much dissatisfied at being discarded, and, as it is apprehended that refusal to use them may induce them to seek employment from the enemy, I have taken the liberty to suspend your resolution concerning them." Congress thereupon reconsidered and repealed the resolution.

After the battle of Monmouth Washington's army returns showed 755 colored soldiers present for duty, being about a tenth of the army. In 1778 Rhode Island passed an act enlisting all men of color of the draft age with a provision that those who were slaves should be free from the time of joining. This was followed by Massachusetts and New York. Sir Henry Clinton, the British Commander-in-Chief, issued a proclamation offering bounties to all negroes who would desert to his standard, which was also done by Cornwallis and Tarleton in the South. Mr. Jefferson wrote that this action had cost Virginia 30,000 able bodied slaves in one year. To meet the British offer, Madison, Generals Greene and Lincoln, and other leading patriots advocated a general recruiting of the Continental forces by offering emancipation to the slaves. This was not, however, generally done, but there was a considerable number of slaves who obtained freedom by serving as substitutes for their owners or their sons in the army.

In the War of 1812 there were a great many colored men who served in the ranks, thruout the country, but there is no available record that at that time any slaves in the South were admitted as substitutes or otherwise on condition of freedom. There were a good many who went over to the enemy on condition of freedom, and two battalions of negroes served at New Orleans under Jackson. In New York two regiments of "freemen of color" were raised to receive the same pay and allowance as whites, and there was a proviso that "any able bodied slave" in that State might enlist "with the written assent of his master and mistress who were to receive his pay," while the negro was to be set free on his honorable discharge. After the battle of New Orleans General Andrew Jackson, in his proclamation, bore emphatic testimony to the part borne by negro troops in that great victory and their bravery and good conduct during their service under him. The British had two regiments of West India negroes in that battle.

During the Civil War 180,000 negroes served in the Union Army. Some of these were from the North, and served either under the draft or as volunteers, but by far the greatest part of them were fugitive slaves who served in northern regiments, either as substitutes, or upon payment of bounties given by townships and counties in the North to fill up their required quotas under the draft.

The Confederate government was asked by General Lee in the fall of 1864 to conscript slaves as soldiers, offering them freedom, but this was opposed by President Davis and others, and the act did not pass till February, 1865, and only a few companies were raised. We often conscripted free negroes, and sometimes slaves, to build forts and breastworks. Those surrounding Raleigh were thus built.

It is believed that with very rare exceptions the colored Union troops in the Civil War served as separate organizations, as now, tho officered by white men. This was true during our Spanish War in 1898. This State, however, which sent two regiments of white soldiers to that war, sent one regiment of colored troops, officered entirely by colored officers, from its Colonel, James H. Young, down.

In the United States Regular Army, ever since the Civil War, there has been several regiments of colored troops, but these have been officered entirely by white men, as only one colored man has ever graduated at West Point.

In the present war there are probably 200,000 colored troops in the United States Army, most of whom have white officers, tho there are some company officers of color. The British and French have many colored troops, of whom the Senegalese are exceptionally brave. It is related that when some American colored troops landed at a French port they were delighted to see colored troops ashore, and commenced talking to them in English, supposing that all negroes spoke our tongue. They proved, however, to be troops from French Africa.

The conduct of the negro troops has generally been good in peace, as well as in war. There was a painful exception in the emeute at Brownsville, Texas, some years ago, and also in the recent riot in a colored regiment at San Antonio, for which some thirty or forty of the colored soldiers were hanged by the government for mutiny. It seems that on both occasions whiskey was at the bottom of the trouble.

The history of our wars shows that colored men, when well led by competent officers, have always shown up as brave soldiers. The two instances named of misconduct seem to be exceptions to their general good conduct and orderly behavior in time of peace.

What is said above refers only to colored slaves. Those acquainted with our Colonial history know, however, that there were many Indian slaves in the Colonies, especially in New England, and some of them in North Carolina, and not a few white slaves. The latter were usually sent to this country from Great Britain to serve out a sentence for crime and sometimes for debt. Among these white slaves was the Lieutenant Colonel of a North Carolina regiment, who on his march to Germantown, with his regiment in 1777 was humiliated by being recognized and claimed in Maryland as a slave, he having escaped thence to North Carolina where he had served an honorable career and risen in life. Massachusetts sold most of her Indian slaves in the West Indies, bringing in return cargoes from Guinea of Africans, who they said were better adapted for work. Among those who, after the Pequot War, Massachusetts sold to the West Indies, were the wife and son of King Philip, the former being the daughter of Massasoit, who had been the best friend whom the Colonists of that Province had ever had, and who had rendered the whites notable service.

Probably the most distinguished colored soldier was General Thomas Alexandre Dumas who served under Napoleon, and at one time was commander in chief of the army of the Eastern Pyrenees. He was the son af a West India negro mother, and to his son Alexandre Dumas the elder, the famous novelist, we are indebted for the famous novels "Monte Cristo," the "Three Muskeeters," with its famous trio Porthos, Athos, and Aramis, and the greatest of all D'Artagnan,

"The Forty-five Guardsmen," and others. Hannibal and his Carthaginians were not negroes, though from Africa.

The free negroes voted in North Carolina till 1835, and under the Federal Constitution three-fifths of the slave population was taken as a basis in the apportionment for members of Congress. Republican disgust at finding that by emancipation, which made negroes freemen, the basis was changed and twenty new members of Congress had been given to the South, is said to have been a strong motive for passing the XV Amendment.

NORTH CAROLINA'S DEAD

At the unveiling of the monument and statue to the Confederate dead at Morganton, 22 January, 1918, the address was delivered by Chief Justice Clark. The following extract from his speech is of more than passing interest:

As against 2,850,000 men in the Union line, the South, first and last, was able to send to the front about 650,000. Of these North Carolina sent 125,000, or nearly one-fifth of the whole number. Of these, 43,000 of our best and bravest, being one-third, came not home again.

They sleep where the silver Shenandoah sweeps along; some rest on the heights at Gettysburg; some sleep by the sounding sea at Charleston; others at Vicksburg,

"By the great inland river, whence the fleets of iron have fled,
And the green grass quivers above the ranks of the dead";

on the plains of Chickamauga and where the Georgian pines are bare; around Petersburg, in the swamps of the Chickahominy and where Potomac's "breezes answering low sooth many a soldier's endless sleep."

Across the fields of yesterday they come back to us, as we knew and remember them, in all the splendor of their young manhood. Age has not withered them. Time and trouble have not touched them. The Roman poet said that it was "sweet to die for one's country." It was glorious for them to pass in the prime of their powers, with the sunlight of victory on their faces and fronting the morning. They died in the full assurance and confident hope of our ultimate success. They saw not the torn and tattered battle flags furled forever at Appomattox. The bugle did not ring out for them, as for you, the final call to stack arms. No drums beat for them the retreat. Their ears caught only the sound of the reveille. They live in immortal youth.

OTHER NORTH CAROLINA HEROINES

By Mary Hilliard Hinton

During these exciting and troublous times of the world's existence when woman is constantly engaged in the service of her country, helping in ways heretofore unknown, giving freely of her time in unstinted service and keeping her purse ever open, it will be interesting, perhaps, to look backward thru the pages of history and gather notes of the spirit of patriotism and heroism of our brave and loyal women patriots, whose deeds have been recorded, and whose sufferings show what our foremothers endured, that they may inspire us to bear nobly whatever trials may be in store. While they were subjected to innumerable privations their lot seems incomparable with the barbarities imposed by "the fiery Hun" upon the weaker population of grief-stricken Belgium and the devastated regions of Northern France and Poland. It was with the British and Tories we were waging a civilized war, not barbarians whose hearts hesitate at no cruelties. That struggle for independence fortunately took place one hundred and forty-eight years ago, during which period the United States of America have developed into one of the leading world powers, whereby she is now able to express to her splendid ally—France—the gratitude of an appreciative people and to render to her mother country the duty of a worthy offspring.

North Carolina's record of her heroic women is indeed meager, and many of her heroines are known by name only with sparse local tradition as proof their bravery. Of quite a number just one brave incident can be cited, which can be accepted as indicative of their conduct during the Revolutionary War. Among the latter can be found the names of Mrs. Elizabeth Forbis, Mrs. Mary Morgan, Mrs. Rachel Denny, Mrs. Sarah Logan, Mrs. Elizabeth McGraw, Miss Ann Fergus, Mrs. Margaret Caruthers and Miss Margaret McBride.

Caruthers, in The Old North State in 1776, has preserved their records from oblivion, but since that rare volume has long since been out of print and few copies are to be found, to give these noble women further recognition, this brief sketch is presented thru the columns of THE BOOKLET.

Among the staunch and brave patriots who were mortally wounded at the Battle of Guilford Court House was Colonel Arthur Forbis. In that same engagement, under his command, was his brother-in-law, Thomas Wiley, also a brave, unwavering Whig, who was wounded. Possessing similar loyalty to the patriotic cause, Elizabeth Forbis, née Wiley, wife of Colonel Forbis, bore with fortitude and patience her severe and continued trials and sufferings. Coming from such stock, it is no marvel that she displayed unusual traits of character, of which the following is illustrative.

Several days after the Battle of Guilford Court House Thomas Morgan, who lived a mile and a half west of the Forbis home, found wandering on his premises two horses whose "bobbed tails" showed that they were the property of the British and Tories, since the horses of the American cavalry were distinguished from that of the enemy by having long tails. These he felt he had a right to appropriate, for the British and Tories had seized all available property of the Whigs.

Mr. Morgan, knowing that Mrs. Forbis was now in dire need of a horse and in a destitute condition, presented her with one the morning following. Colonel Forbis was either dead or dying of his wounds; the Tories had cleared the plantation of almost all cattle, provisions, grain, etc.; her eldest boy was a mere lad of thirteen or fourteen years and could only plough a gentle animal, her sole means of making a crop. This gift she accepted thankfully and immediately put her son to the plough handle. However, on the next day as he was turning furrows in a corn field and the mother was dropping corn after the plough and covering it with a hoe, two young men appeared on the scene and demanded the return of the horse then in the plough, one claiming it was his own. Mrs. Forbis did not dream the men were from the British Army, then thirty or forty miles south of that locality on the way to Wilmington. With this demand she flatly refused to comply. It was repeated two or three times, she still refusing to obey, when he ordered the lad to take the horse from the plough. She forbade her son to do so, he standing resolute, looking from her to the enemy, respecting the one and fearing the other, but obeying the mother. Thereupon the man stepped forward to unfasten the traces himself, and instantly she sprang in front of him, with a hoe raised high above her head, and with a firm expression and determined manner, declared that if he touched the horse "she would split his head with the hoe." This act produced the desired effect—the horse remained in her plough and was never molested again.

Mrs. Forbis lived to enjoy the independence of her country many years, attaining an honorable old age, noted for her cheerful disposition and as a warm-hearted Christian character.

Of Colonel Forbis' sister and near neighbor, Mrs. Mary Morgan, wife of Thomas Morgan, this daring feat is related:

At the time the British Army was encamped on the south side of South Buffalo Creek, the same side on which Thomas Morgan lived, on the plantation of Ralph Gorrell, Esq., and from this camp one day a party sallied forth bent on plunder, taking in Colonel Paisley's plantation and later the Morgan home, in the absence of the owner, only Mrs. Morgan and her little brood being present. As the place had frequently experienced visitations of marauding soldiers but little could be found. Still they ransacked the dwelling from cellar to garret, as well as the kitchen and smoke-house, corn-crib and barn, leaving naught in their wake. In the interval Mrs. Morgan's active mind was at work and the thought occurred to her to retaliate by removing the valise from the saddle of the commanding officer and dropping it in an inside corner of the fence among the tall weeds, a few panels below the horse from which it was taken. As they prepared to leave the sun had nearly reached the horizon, and five or six miles lay between them and their camp, there was considerable hurry and confusion which caused the officer in command to overlook the loss of his valise. On opening it, Mrs. Morgan found it to be filled with fine linen shirts, collars, cravats, and other articles which in value far exceeded that which she had lost.

The true Irish wit displayed by Mrs. Rachel Denny has amused many a listener. She was the wife of Walter Denny, a strict elderly Scotch-Irish Presbyterian, who dwelt far down on North Buffalo Creek, as staunch in his Whig principles as true to his religious faith and highly esteemed thruout the neighborhood. During his absence from home when the British Army was near by, a foraging party under command of the proper officer invaded his home, pillaging every repository of his possession. During this trying ordeal the old lady, his wife, sat by utterly helpless in the presence of the commanding officer, who sat near amusing himself with her. Thus she saw flour, meat and meal as well as blankets she had made with her own hands seized by ruthless hands. The officer began by asking her where her husband was, to which she replied she did not know. If she did know would she tell, was the next question. Kindly she said "No, and no gentleman of honorable feelings would ever ask or expect such a thing." When asked if she was not afraid that he would be caught and hung as a rebel, she replied, "as he was engaged in a good cause, he was in good hands, and she hoped he would be protected." After cursing her most profanely he informed her he thought "the women in that part of the country as damned rebels as the men, and that one-half of them, at least, ought to be shot or hung." To all this she did not reply.

Spying a Bible and a hymn-book on the table, he exclaimed that he presumed "the old man prayed every day in his family." To this Mrs. Denny added that when at home they usually had family prayers. "Well, does he ever pray for King George?" followed in a sneering, haughty air. She gave an indirect answer. He then told her emphatically she must tell him "He must pray for King George." Very indifferently she replied that perhaps a good man might pray for the salvation of his soul, "not for the success of his arms; for he had sinned so long and so much that there was very little encouragement to pray even for his salvation, and to pray for the success of his arms when they were employed to oppress and to enforce obedience to unrighteous authority, would be praying in direct opposition to the instructions of the Bible, which would be offensive to God as it would be useless to man." Whereupon the officer told her that her husband must pray for the king or be treated as a rebel. "Ah, indeed," said Mrs. Denny, "he has been denounced as a rebel long ago, and no thanks to you nor King George either that he still lives to defend his country." "Well," he replied, "do you tell him that he must pray for King George tonight, for I intend to come or send men to ascertain, and if he does not, I will have him taken and hung up to the limb of that oak tree in the yard." "Aye, fa'th," retorted the brave old dame, with consummate nonchalance, "Aye, fa'th, an' monny a prayer has been wasted upon King George."

The young Lieutenant, baffled, summoned his men as the sun was fast sinking in the west and quickly galloped back to camp, taking with them considerable plunder, but by no means all of Mr. Denny's abundance.

During the stormy days of the Revolution the women were just as willing as the men to suffer and share privations with them. The country being thinly settled, they were much isolated and had to face innumerable perils. Frequently the quick wit and ready, proper word of some intelligent woman achieved a decided triumph. To this class could be assigned Mrs. Sarah Logan, noted for her repartee, excellent sense and kindness of heart, and who was universally esteemed. She was a native of North Carolina, though after her marriage she lived in South Carolina, near the dividing line. Many incidents occurred that testified to her patriotism, judgment, character and ready wit. This one related here in particular is illustrative of her varied experiences.

One morning in November when the air was cold and frosty four or five Tories swooped down upon her home in the absence of her husband. They were known to her by sight and name, though they were not of her class. She spied them as soon as they entered the lane and at once guessed their purpose. She instantly resolved to devise some scheme by which to safeguard her property against their pillage.

They rode up and hitched their horses to the fence within a few feet of the house and entered without ceremony. Mrs. Logan feigned a cordial welcome and invited them to be seated, adding that such cold weather, after a long ride, they must be cold and insisted on their sitting nearer the fire, on which she had more wood piled. She inquired of the health of their families, of the neighborhood; in fact, received these avowed enemies bent on pillage as graciously as though they were friends. She apologized for the upturned state of her house, claiming that her duties of housecleaning had been neglected for a sick child and was just so engaged as they approached, that if they would excuse her giving annoyance she would proceed and finish in two or three minutes. She swept vigorously, raising a cloud of dust. She next began making up the bed, beating the feathers and seizing sheets and bedspread and blankets, taking each at a time, she stood on the door-step and shook them violently, making a great noise and flutter as each spread out on the breeze. The horses became alarmed, one broke loose, then another, until all severed their bridles and galloped in every direction. The Tories, realizing that their steeds were more valuable than any plunder to be procured at the Logans', took to their heels in hot pursuit, catching, as they bolted, Mrs. Logan's regrets—

"very sorry"—"what a pity." Thus kindness proved of more service than the sword or a sharp retort.

There lived in Surry County, near Mount Airy, during the "Old War" (as the old people termed the Revolution) Mrs Eliabeth McGraw. She was prior to her marriage to Jacob McGraw a Miss Waller, daughter of George Waller of Henry County, Virginia. Both she and her husband were staunch Whigs; therefore their home was naturally an objective point with the bands of Tories scouring that section. Still an account of one raid is handed down in that locality. It occurred on a bitterly cold night when Jacob McGraw was away from home and his wife was the sole white person on the place. When she ascertained they were approaching she made all the negroes who could leave run and seek some hiding place, and in the meantime she engaged busily in wrapping the pickaninnies in the tow that had been hackled from flax that day, dressed and secreted them in a closet, just finishing as the Tories burst into the house. They searched the place from top to bottom, but, strange to say, missed locating the little negroes concealed in the tow. They appropriated all valuables and lastly took from the cupboard Mrs. McGraw's shining pewter plates. Thru the rims of each they bored holes and ran a hickory withe which they carried along with them. Years after Mrs. McGraw had the peculiar experience of taking dinner at a neighbor's when the meal was served from her own pewter plates with holes in the rims. She attained a great age, dying near Mount Airy in 1836.

Even amid the horrors of war people can and do relax from their responsibilities and sufferings long enough to engage in diverting festivities, better perhaps for the change. During Major Craig's occupancy of Wilmington he and his officers attended many balls and other entertainments. Tradition still keeps alive in New Hanover amusing things that took place at these social affairs. One anecdote, though ludicrous, that has not been lost, concerned Miss Ann Fergus, a lass of a wealthy Scotch family of fine social standing. She possessed a superior intellect, was well educated. Exceedingly tall—five feet ten inches—but when wearing the high heel slippers of that period, as she would have done at a ball, she must have measured fully six feet. One of her brothers was in the Patriot Army, possibly also a lover. One evening she attended a ball at which a number of British officers were present. Among them was an exceedingly diminutive man, full of conceit, who was most persistent in his attentions to the American ladies, being both impertinent and presumptuous, as his conduct to Miss Fergus proved. During the evening he sought her out and asked for a kiss. With all seriousness and perhaps hauteur she replied "Yes, he might have one, if he could take one without getting upon a stool." Whereupon he tiptoed and stretched his neck and she drew herself up to her full height, and he "couldn't come it." The whole company present were intensely amused at so ludicrous a spectacle. Ridicule caused his instant flight as well as brought to an end his attentions to American belles.

It is not often that a woman possesses such spirit of daring and bravery that she is willing to attack an enemy of the other sex, assuming the role of aggressor. Of such type was Mrs. Margaret (Gillespie) Caruthers, a native of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, who settled with her husband, James Caruthers, in middle North Carolina some time prior to the Revolution. Her family included four sons and several daughters, all eventually becoming useful citizens and church members. Three of her sons served in the Revolution. The eldest, Robert, being a partisan leader, won the rank of captain and was very active, being almost always on duty. The youngest, who was retained at home to protect his parents and attend to the farm, met death at the hands of Tories disguised as Indians, as strong circumstantial evidence proved. His dead body was found by a creek on the plantation almost in sight of the house. He had gone to a neighbor's, two miles distant on an errand. The report of a gun drew his mother and sisters to the spot to find him dead, scalped with a bloody knife bearing the name of a neighbor, lying near his head. Ever after when the said neighbor met a member of the family his countenance expressed guilt and he manifestly shunned them. Thus deprived of her main support, with her husband, not infirm but passed the draftable age, compelled for safety to conceal himself, she found herself unprotected, especially during the trying year of 1780. Her wonderful self-possession never failed her in time of danger. Her firmness and energy of character, combined with the "spirit of '76," rendered her far from helpless in emergencies.

Not long after the tragedy just recounted, two Tories, neighbors, came to plunder her premises. They at once attempted to steal a fine young black mare, of unusual beauty and splendid qualities, which they brought out and hitched to a shade tree on the west side of the house." After packing up all provisions, blankets, etc., to be found in the house they entered the corn-crib to fill their bags with corn. The quaint form of crib of that day had an opening thru which a man must thrust one leg, next his head "and with his body laid beside the projecting leg force himself thru, with the other leg resting on the floor, and, at the same time, as it was raised a foot or two above the ground, held by the side with the left hand lest when the center of gravity passed the sill, he might go faster and further than he wanted." The thieves were busy over their grain when Mrs. Caruthers hid the black mare in the cellar, locking the door. Then she took a stick of hickory, intended for an axe-handle, laid by to season in the chimney corner, twice the size of a dressed article, which she concealed under her apron and stood at the corner of the crib. As each appeared she beat upon him so successfully that he could neither defend himself nor return the blows, and both fled in haste, leaving their plunder behind and never again did they dare to enter the Caruthers home.

The name of Betsy Dowdy is universally known and her bravery can never be forgotten, while the name of Margaret McBride is familiar to comparatively few and of the service rendered her country little is known. As her surname implies she was of a Scotch-Irish family. Hanty McBride, a resident of Guilford, was a man of good standing in the neighborhood where he lived and died, some seven or eight miles south of Greensboro, midway between Alamance and Buffalo creeks. He was a member of Dr. Caldwell's congregation, and a true Whig. Too old for military duty, he served his country when possible. His large family was comprised of nearly all daughters. Of one son, Isaiah, the oldest, we learn that he was in several campaigns.

In 1781 Margaret, or Maggie, as her family and neighbors called her, was a pretty lass of thirteen or fourteen summers and well grown for her years. She was full of life, but discreet and had the courage to express her convictions. With winsome ways and abounding enthusiasm, she was naturally a favorite. She gloried in being a Whig and hated the Tories. A certain tract of land four or five miles wide, ten or twelve in length, between North and South Buffalo creeks, lay to the north and northwest of Hantz McBride's. This included the present site of Greensboro and ran along both sides of the Hillsboro road to Buffalo Bridge. This was not inhabited and was traversed only by roads connecting the two settlements. As pine was the principal growth it was called the "Pine Woods," or "Pine Barrens." People did not settle there because the land was considered too thin. It afforded fine pasturage for cattle. At intervals rich and well-watered glades existed like oases of the desert. In the first days of autumn, 1781, a band of Tories from southern Guilford or northern Randolph pitched camp in one of these fairy dells. The Whigs were thick on the outskirts of the "Barrens" and some were wavering. These the Tories in question visited and exerted no good influence over them. The true Patriots became uneasy—something must be done, and accordingly a band bent on retaliation was organized, though none knew the exact location of the camp. It was thought that the McBrides knew of it if any one did, so to that home they repaired one evening just after dark. Hantz McBride, of course, was absent, the mother, Maggie and other children were there. The captain, after ascertaining they were staunch Whigs, inquired whether there was a Tory camp in the "Piney Woods." She understood there was. When asked for directions to find it, she answered as intelligently and as best she could, little Maggie by her side now then adding a word of explanation. The captain observed her interest and said courteously, "Well, now, my little Miss, could you go along to show us the way?" This startled her. Objections she urged—going off with a party of soldiers, all strangers; then the fighting, etc. The captain insisted. She reckoned she might go; they must promise not to fire on the Tories till she left them. They consented, so she mounted behind the commander and they rode off at full speed. It was agreed that she should remain with the band until they came in sight of the place, when she was to fly back home, it being impossible for her to be taken into the battle in the darkness. She was firm in her determination to render this invaluable service to the Whigs, and never faltered when so much was at stake. The spot was familiar to her as she had frequently been there when hunting the cows on summer evenings with the other children.

As they approached the camp near enough for the sound of the horses' feet to be heard, they proceeded with great caution and Margaret McBride was straining her eyes and craning her neck to ascertain the exact spot. Finally she exclaimed, "Yonder they are," and sprang from the captain's horse, returning home with the agility of a native of the forest. As soon as she alighted on the ground the party dashed forward at a gallop, took the camp by surprise, firing a good volley as a greeting on approach. Before the brave little heroine had passed over much ground, she heard the report of twenty or thirty pistols and the clash of sabres, with shouts of victory and cries of the assailed, all of which made her run but the faster. On reaching home she proudly informed her mother that "those miserable Tories have got a lesson tonight which they will not soon forget, and I hope they will no longer be a pest and a reproach to the country." "Why, my daughter," replied Mrs. McBride, "You didn't stay to see what was done?" "Why, mother, as soon as we came in sight, I jumped down and started back as hard as I could, but I had come a very little distance—it didn't seem to be a minute—till I heard ever so many guns, and then such slashing and hallooing—you never heard the like. I just know the ugly things are used up, and we shall now be clear of them. Well, I do feel sorry for them after all—really sorry. Just think how they will be cut up and run off like as many sheep-killing dogs; but then they had no business to be Tories. If they are so mean and pusillanimous that they want to be slaves or foot-pads to King George, let them not stay here and try to make us as degraded as themselves, but go to his own country and serve him there. We have no use for them here and I am so glad they are gone."

The Tory den was completely broken up. All that were not killed fled, and henceforth the "Pine Barrens" of Guilford knew neither them nor their like again.

When Margaret McBride grew to womanhood a few years later she married and, with her husband, moved westward with the tide of emigration that laid the foundation of some of our great States of today, and nothing was known of this brave heroine of old Guilford.

North Carolina can well be proud of her women from the earliest days when the hardships and perils of life led by the first settlers in the wilderness were patiently borne, during the stormy times of the Revolution, of the War between the States and, lastly, of the response they are giving to the demands of this present-day world conflict.

History of the Superior and Supreme Courts of North Carolina

By Chief Justice Walter Clark

Prior to the adoption of our republican form of government in 1776 we had for the colony a supreme common law and equity court, styled "The General Court," which was a trial court. There was no court of appeals. The presiding officer of this was styled Chief Justice, who presided with an indefinite number of assistants who were laymen. They were probably merely advisers, for there was no statute defining their powers. When the Lords Proprietors met at the Cockpit in London on 21 October, 1669, under the fanciful Constitution drawn up by the famous John Locke, they chose Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterwards the famous Earl of Shaftesbury, as the Lord Chancellor and first Chief Justice of this colony. This was an honorary appointment, and he named as his representative John Willoughby as the first Chief Justice in this colony.

The first record that we have of any general court is that held in 1694, at the house of Thomas White, tho there must have been sessions in the years prior thereto. The Chief Justice at that time was also Governor, Thomas Harvey. This court held jurisdiction of criminal and common law cases, and also as a court of equity. Down to 1868, when the distinction between law and equity was abolished, the same judges held the courts of law and the courts of equity, tho the distinction between the two as separate jurisdictions was kept up.

By the Court Bill of 1746 the seat of government was fixed at New Bern. Following the English system, all writs and processes were issued from that court, but they were returnable and triable before nisi prius terms to be held by the Chief Justice twice a year at three points—at Edenton, in the Northern Circuit; at Wilmington, in the Southern Circuit; and at the courthouse in Edgecombe in the Western Circuit. The supreme and principal court continued to be held twice a year at New Bern, and was styled the General Court. This latter consisted of the Chief Justice and three Associates appointed by the Governor. In 1713 Christopher Gale was Chief Justice. He was born in Yorkshire, England, and was the son of the rector of a church. The late Colonel George Little of Raleigh was his lineal descendant. He was succeeded by Tobias Knight, who was accused (but acquitted) of complicity with the pirate "Blackbeard," and he by Frederick Jones, of indifferent fame. Gale on his return from England was again appointed. In 1724 Governor Burrington removed him and appointed Thomas Pollock, but the Lords Proprietors reinstated Gale. In 1729 the Lords Proprietors ceded their rights to the crown, and in 1731 Gale was superseded by William Smith, who had been educated at an English University, and had been admitted to the bar in England.

Governor Burrington appointed John Palin to succeed Smith, and then William Little, who was the son-in-law of Gale. On his death Daniel Hamner became Chief Justice, who in turn was replaced by William Smith, who had come back from England. In 1740 John Montgomery became Chief Justice, and was succeeded in 1744 by Edward Moseley, a man of real ability. He died in 1749, and his successors were in turn Enoch Hall, Eleazer Allen, James Hazel, and Peter Henly.

In 1746 an important change was made by the court law of that year. Up to that time the Chief Justice had sat with from two to ten assistants who were simply justices of the peace, and it is not certain even that all the Chief Justices were lawyers. Even down to the present time, tho in fact since 1771, all of the judges of the Superior and Supreme Court have been lawyers, there has never been, at any time, any provision of the Constitution requiring this. Under the Act of 1746, however, three associates were appointed in lieu of the former lay assistants, and they were required to be "learned in the law."

Charles Berry became Chief Justice in 1760, and committed suicide in 1766. In 1767 the province was divided into five judicial districts—Edenton, New Bern, Wilmington, Halifax, and Hillsboro—in each of which towns a court was held twice each year by the Chief Justice and his Associates. The Chief Justice was Martin Howard, and the Associates were Richard Henderson and Maurice Moore. Judge Henderson was the father of Chief Justice Leonard Henderson, and Judge Moore was the father of Justice Alfred Moore of the United States Supreme Court. Chief Justice Martin Howard, on the outbreak of the Revolution, sided with the Tories and returned to Rhode Island, whence he had come. The Court Act of 1767 expired at the end of five years, and by reason of disagreement between the Governor and the Legislature there were no courts in the province between 1773 and 1777. After August, 1775, till the Judiciary Act, adopted 15 November, 1777, by the new State Government, the judicial functions were discharged by the committees of public safety.

Under the Provincial Government the Chief Justice was a member of the Upper House of the General Assembly, and also aided largely in the executive functions. On the other hand the Governor granted letters of administration, probate of wills, and had other judicial jurisdiction. The Constitution of 1776, on the contrary, made both the executive and judiciary elective by the General Assembly, which was chosen annually. The Constitution of 1868 made the Supreme and Superior Courts constitutional offices and beyond repeal by legislative action. It also made the judges elective by the people for the term of eight years.

By the Judiciary Act of 1777 the State was divided into six districts—Wilmington, New Bern, Edenton, Halifax, Hillsboro, and Salisbury. In 1782 Morganton was added, and in 1787 Fayetteville, making eight in all. In each of these a court was held twice each year by the three judges jointly. The first judges selected were Samuel Spencer of Anson, Samuel Ashe of New Hanover, and James Iredell of Chowan. Iredell, who was later a Justice of the United States Supreme Court, soon resigned, and was succeeded by John Williams of Granville. Judge Ashe was elected Governor in 1795, but Spencer served till his death in 1794, and Williams died in 1799. Judge Spencer's death was singular. In old age he was asleep on a warm day in a chair under the shade of a tree. A turkey gobbler enraged by the red handkerchief which the judge had placed over his face to keep off the flies, assaulted him, causing his death.

In 1790 Halifax, Edenton, New Bern, and Wilmington districts were constituted the Eastern Riding, and Morganton, Salisbury, Fayetteville, and Hillsboro the Western. The number of judges was increased to four, by the election of Judge Spruce McKay, and two judges were assigned to hold the courts, jointly, in each riding.

The Constitution of 1776 provided that the General Assembly should by joint ballot appoint judges of the Supreme Court who should hold during good behavior. The General Assembly seemed to consider that, there being no appellate court, the Superior Court filled this requirement, for there was no appellate court until one was created in 1799, consisting of all the Superior Court Judges, to continue for one year, the object being to try James Glasgow, Secretary of State, and others for fraud in the issuance of land scrip in Tennessee issued to Revolutionary soldiers. At the expiration of one year the act was continued in force by chapter 12, Laws 1801, which provided, among other things, section 3: "No attorney should be allowed to speak or admitted as counsel in the aforesaid court." This was a repetition of a similar prejudice against lawyers which found expression in Locke's "Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina," March, 1669, which provided, section 70, that no one could plead for another in any court for money or reward. We have outlived those days tho there is still some prejudice naturally surviving against so necessary and influential a profession as ours.

This court was styled the "Court of Conference." In 1804 the court was required to file written opinions, and in 1805 the title was changed to the "Supreme Court," a tardy recognition of the constitutional provision of 1776, and the sheriff of Wake County was made marshal of the court.

In 1806 the ridings were increased to six by the election of two additional judges, and a Superior Court for the first time was required to be held twice a year in the courts in each county by a single judge. Till 1856 these judges met and themselves allotted the ridings, the only restriction being that no judge should hold the same riding twice in succession. In 1857 this was changed to require the judges to hold every district in the whole State in regular rotation. By the Constitution of 1868 judges of the Superior Court each held only his own district. In 1878 this was changed back to require the Superior Court judges to ride the entire State in rotation. In 1910 the number of districts having been increased to 20, it was felt to be a hardship that a judge should ride his own circuit only one time in twenty, and that it was an anomaly that a judge should be required for nineteen-twentieths of his time to preside over people who had had no hand in his nomination, and the State, as in 1790, was divided into two divisions, the judges to rotate in holding only the districts of their respective divisions. Further changes in that direction are desirable and will doubtless be made.

In 1910 the judges hearing appeals in conference were authorized to elect a Chief Justice, and John Louis Taylor was the first and only judge to fill that position. A seal and motto were directed to be established by the court and the right of appeal was prescribed. Any two judges of the six, sitting in conference at Raleigh, was a quorum.

In November, 1818, the Supreme Court, contemplated forty-two years before by the Constitution of 1776, was at last created by legislative enactment, the bill being introduced by Hon. William Gaston, afterwards one of the most illustrious members of the court. The salary of the judges was fixed at $2,500 each, the salary of the Governor at that time being $1,900, and the salary of the Superior Court judges, previously $1,650, was raised to $1,800. The judges of the Superior and Supreme Court were elected by the Legislature and held for life till 1868, when these courts were created in the Constitution, without liability of abolishment by the Legislature as formerly, and the judges were made elective by the people for the term of eight years.

The Supreme Court, created in 1818, began its existence 1 January, 1819. Its first session was held 5 January, 1819. John Louis Taylor, Leonard Henderson, and John Hall were elected, who chose Taylor for Chief Justice. John Louis Taylor was at that time the oldest judge in commission on the Superior Court bench, having been elected in 1798. He was born in London of Irish parentage, 1 March, 1769. At twelve years of age he was brought to this country by his elder brother, and received his education in part at William and Mary College in Virginia, but left before graduation. He was admitted to the bar in 1788, located in Fayetteville, and was chosen a member of the Legislature from that town, which elected a borough member, for four terms. He removed to New Bern in 1796. He died in Raleigh in January, 1829.

Leonard Henderson was born in that part of Granville County which is now Vance, in 1772. His sister married Spruce McKay, already mentioned, and his niece became the wife of Judge Boyden of the North Carolina Supreme Court. He was elected to the Superior Court in 1808 and resigned in 1816. Elected to the Supreme Court as above, he became Chief Justice in 1829 and died in August, 1833.

John Hall, the third member of the court, was the senior of the other two, having been born in Augusta County, Virginia, in May, 1767. His father was a native of Ireland. He was a graduate of William and Mary College. He removed to Warrenton, N. C., in 1792, and in 1800 was elected a judge of the Superior Court, and of the Supreme Court as above stated, on its organization. He resigned in December, 1832, and died in January, 1833.

On the death of Chief Justice Taylor, John D. Toomer was appointed by the Governor to the bench, and Judge Henderson was elected by his associates, Chief Justice.

In the meantime Archibald D. Murphey, of the Superior Court, under a provision in the act creating the court, was detailed by the Governor, by special commission, to sit in the cases where any one of the three incumbents was disqualified to sit because of having been counsel in any cause. Judge Murphey was thus assigned by Governor Branch and sat in several cases. His concurrence with Chief Justice Taylor against Judge Hall's dissent sustained the validity of the Moses Griffin will, under which New Bern has ever since possessed the "Griffin School." Judge Murphey has always been very dear to the people of this State. He was the son of Colonel Archibald Murphey, a Revolutionary soldier of Caswell County. He was born in 1777 and graduated at the University of North Carolina with the highest distinction in 1799. From 1812 to 1818 by annual election he was Senator from Orange. He was the originator of the system of internal improvements and common schools in this State. He purposed to write a history of North Carolina. In 1818 he narrowly missed election to the Supreme Court and was chosen to fill one of the vacancies on the Superior Court. His oration before the two literary societies of the University of North Carolina in 1827 was the first of a long series of these and has never been surpassed by any. Under the common law barbarism of imprisonment for debt, this distinguished man, who reflects so much honor on his State, was for some months in Guilford jail, without any fault on his part. He died in 1832.

John D. Toomer was born in Wilmington, March, 1834; was educated in part at the University of North Carolina, but did not graduate. He was elected judge of the Superior Court in 1818, but soon resigned. On the death of Chief Justice Taylor in 1829 he was appointed by Governor Owen to the Supreme Court till the Legislature met, which chose Thomas Ruffin to succeed him. Judge Toomer was afterwards in the State Senate and a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1835. In 1836 he was again elected judge of the Superior Court, but resigned in 1840.

Thomas Ruffin was born in Virginia in November, 1787. He was the son of a Methodist minister. He was educated at Princeton University. He studied law under Judge Murphey and was admitted to the bar in 1808, locating in Hillsboro. In 1813, 1815, and 1816 he was a member of the House of Commons from the borough of Hillsboro and in the last-named year was Speaker, and was chosen judge of the Superior Court, but resigned after two years service. The first seven volumes of North Carolina Reports down to the creation of the separate Supreme Court, 1 January, 1819, were by volunteer reporters. The act creating the court authorized the court to appoint the reporter. The first of these was Judge Murphey. Later Judge Ruffin was one of the reporters. In the summer of 1825 he was again elected judge of the Superior Court, but resigned after three years service, when in 1828 he was chosen president of the State Bank at Raleigh. In December, 1829, he was chosen by the Legislature to the Supreme Court. On the death of Chief Justice Henderson in 1833 and the appointment of Judge Gaston, he was chosen by his associates Chief Justice, and served for nineteen years, resigning from the court in 1852. In 1858, on the death of his successor, Chief Justice Nash, he was called by the almost unanimous vote of the General Assembly, tho then in his 72d year, again to the Supreme bench, and took his place as Associate Justice. Eighteen months later he again resigned and died in 1870 in his 83d year. He raised a family of thirteen children. One of his sons, Thomas Ruffin, Jr., became a judge of the Superior and Supreme Courts.

Joseph J. Daniel, born in Halifax County in 1784, was at the State University, but did not graduate. He studied law under General William R. Davie at Halifax. He represented that borough and the county in the General Assembly. He was elected to the Superior Court in 1816 and, after sixteen years of service, on the death of Judge Hall was elected to the Supreme Court. He died in February, 1848. His opinions are notable for brevity and point. He died in 1848.

For eleven years, 1833 to 1844, Ruffin, Daniel and Gaston sat together on the Supreme Court bench, and it has never been surpassed in ability and reputation. Yet that court rendered an erroneous decision, Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C., 1 (in 1833), which gave infinite trouble till, after seventy years, it was overruled. It held that an office was property. This decision was not followed by any other State and its doctrine was denied by the United States Supreme Court. Still such was the veneration felt for the court that it was cited with approval more than sixty times; but, however, after being questioned in a series of dissenting opinions which called attention to its being opposed to our entire theory of government, it was finally overruled (in 1903) in Mial v. Ellington, 134 N. C., page 131. During its existence as authority no case ever caused more inconvenience in the administration of our State Government than this.

William Gaston was born in New Bern in 1778. His father was a native of the North of Ireland, of Huguenot descent, and graduated at the Edinburgh Medical College. Chief Justice John Louis Taylor married Judge Gaston's sister. Gaston served in the State Senate, represented the borough town of New Bern in the House of Commons, and was speaker of that body. He was a member of Congress from 1812 to 1816. His address before the literary societies at the University of North Carolina in 1832, and at Princeton in 1834, were models of their kind. He was the author of our State hymn, "The Old North State." On the death of Chief Justice Henderson in 1833 Gaston was elected to the Supreme Court. He died suddenly at Raleigh during the session of the court in January, 1844.

On the death of Judge Gaston, Frederick Nash of Orange was elected to succeed him. He was born in New Bern in 1781, when his father, Abner Nash, was Governor, and was a nephew of General Francis Nash, who was killed at Germantown. He graduated at Princeton College with distinction in 1799. In 1808 he removed to Hillsboro and represented that borough town and also the county of Orange in the General Assembly. In 1818 he was elected judge of the Superior Court, but resigned in 1826. He was again elected to the Superior Court in 1835, and upon the death of Judge Gaston in 1844 he was elected to succeed him, being then in his 64th year. On the resignation of Chief Justice Ruffin in 1852, he was elected by his associates, Chief Justice, and died in 1858 in the 78th year of his age.

William H. Battle was born in Edgecombe in October, 1802, the grandson of Elisha Battle, a prominent member of the Baptist church in this State. He was the oldest of six brothers, all of whom were educated at the University. He was appointed Reporter of the Supreme Court in 1839. In 1833 and 1834 he was a member of the House of Commons from Franklin and, together with Governor Iredell and Judge Nash, was a member of the commission which compiled the Revised Statutes. He was promoted to the Superior Court in 1839. In 1843 he removed to Chapel Hill, and in 1845 he was elected by the trustees of the University professor of law and conducted the Law School till 1866. Among his students were three of his successors on the Supreme Bench—

Davis, Shepherd, and Clark. In May, 1848, on the death of Judge Daniel, he was appointed by Governor William A. Graham to fill the vacancy till the Legislature met, which elected Richmond M. Pearson and chose Judge Battle to the vacancy created on the Superior Court bench. In 1852, upon the resignation of Chief Justice Ruffin, Judge Nash became Chief Justice, and Judge Battle was elected to the Supreme Court bench by an almost unanimous vote, irrespective of party. He filled the position till 1865 when all the State offices were declared vacant. He was then again elected to the Supreme Court and filled the post until all positions were vacated by the new Constitution in 1868, when he returned to the practice of the law. In 1876 he was chosen president of the Raleigh National Bank. In 1877 his son, Kemp P. Battle, having been elected President of the University, Judge Battle returned to Chapel Hill as Dean of the Law School. He published a Digest of the North Carolina Reports in four volumes, and edited the compilation of laws known as Battle's Revisal. He died in March, 1879, in the 77th year of his age.

Richmond M. Pearson was born in June, 1805, in Rowan; graduated at the University in 1823. He studied law under Chief Justice Henderson, and was licensed in 1826. For four years he represented Rowan in the House of Commons, and in 1835 was defeated for Congress. In 1836 he was elected to the Superior Court, to the Supreme Court in December, 1848, and became Chief Justice in 1858, and was reëlected Chief Justice by the people in 1868. His judicial career covered forty-one years of unbroken service—twelve years on the Superior Court bench and twenty-nine on the Supreme Court, nineteen of them as Chief Justice. As Chief Justice he presided at the impeachment of Governor Holden in 1871. In January, 1878, on his way to Raleigh to open the spring term of court, while crossing the Yadkin River in a buggy, he was stricken with paralysis and died at Winston, 5 January, 1878, in the 73d year of his age.

Matthias E. Manly was the last of the judges who ascended the bench in antebellum days. He was born in Chatham in 1800; graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1824; studied law under his brother, Governor Manly, and located in New Bern. He was a member of the House of Commons from that borough in 1834-1835, being the last borough representative. The six towns which enjoyed that privilege were Halifax, New Bern, Wilmington, Hillsboro, Fayetteville, and Salisbury. It was abolished by the Convention of 1835. Judge Manly was elected judge of the Superior Court in 1840, and, after faithful service of nineteen years, he was chosen to the Supreme Court, in December, 1859, to fill the vacancy caused by the second retirement of Judge Ruffin. His office was declared vacant in 1865 and Judge E. G. Reade was elected to succeed him. He was Speaker of the State Senate in 1866, and was elected by that Legislature to the United States Senate, jointly with Governor Graham, but they were not allowed to take their seats. He died in New Bern in 1881 in the 82d year of his age. His first wife was the daughter of Judge Gaston.

Edwin G. Reade was born in Person County in November, 1812. His father died while he was very young, and he aided to support the family by menial work on the farm and in the carriage and blacksmith shop and in the tanyard. He read law, without an instructor, in books kindly loaned to him, and received license to practice in 1835. He was elected to Congress in 1855, but declined a reëlection. In 1863 he was appointed by Governor Vance to the Confederate States Senate, and in the same year was chosen judge of the Superior Court. In 1865 he was elected by the Legislature to the Supreme Court to succeed Judge Manly, being the last judge chosen by the General Assembly. In 1866 and 1867 he was elected Grand Master of the Masons. In 1868 the Supreme Court having been enlarged by the new Constitution to consist of five members, Chief Justice Pearson and Judge Reade were chosen by the people to succeed themselves, with

W. B. Rodman, R. P. Dick, and Thomas Settle as their Associates. Judge Reade's term expired 1 January, 1879, when he was chosen president of the Raleigh National Bank, then somewhat embarrassed. Like Chief Justice Ruffin, under similar circumstances, he restored the credit of the bank. In 1865 he was elected almost unanimously to the State Convention and was elected its president by acclamation. It is said that in his prime he had no superior as an advocate in this State before a jury. He was on the Supreme Court thirteen years. He died in Raleigh 18 October, 1894, in his 82d year.

Judge William B. Rodman was born in Washington, N. C., in June, 1817. He graduated at the University of North Carolina at the head of his class in 1836; read law with Judge Gaston and was licensed to practice in 1838. He was captain of heavy artillery at New Bern in March, 1862; was quartermaster in Branch's brigade, but was soon appointed on a military court with the rank of colonel. He was elected to the Convention of 1868 and, with Tourgee and Victor Barringer, was on the commission which prepared the new Code of Civil Procedure. He was elected by the people in 1868 to the new Supreme Court, and under the construction the court gave to the terms of the judges first elected under the Constitution, he served for ten years, and retired to practice law in 1879. He died in March, 1893.

Judge Robert P. Dick was born in Greensboro in October, 1823. His father, Hon. John M. Dick, was judge of the Superior Court for nearly thirty years from 1832 till his death in October, 1861. Judge Dick graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1843; read law with his father and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He was United States District Attorney from 1852 till 1861. He was a member of the State Convention of 1861, and signed the Ordinance of Secession. He was State Senator from Guilford in 1864, and was appointed United States District Judge in 1865, but resigned because unable to take the "iron clad" oath.

In March, 1867, he was a member of the convention which organized the Republican party in this State, and in April, 1868, he was elected justice of the Supreme Court. In June, 1872, he was appointed United States District Judge for the newly created Western District of North Carolina. He died in September, 1898.

Thomas Settle was born in Rockingham County in 1831. His father, Thomas Settle, was a member of Congress from 1817 to 1821; speaker of the House of Commons, 1827-8, and judge of the Superior Court from 1832 till his resignation in 1854. The subject of this sketch graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1850; read law with Judge Pearson, with whom he afterwards sat on the Supreme Court, and was licensed to practice in 1854. He was a member of the Legislature from 1854 to 1859. He was Speaker of the House in 1858; and an elector on the Buchanan ticket in 1856. He entered the war in 1861 as captain of a company in the Thirteenth North Carolina Regiment. At the end of a year's service, he resigned upon his election as solicitor of his district, which position he occupied till 1868. He was a member of the Convention of 1865. In April, 1868, he was elected to the Supreme Court, but resigned in February, 1871, on his appointment as Minister to Peru. On his return from Peru in 1872 he was president of the Republican National Convention which nominated Grant for a second term. On the resignation of Judge Dick, Judge Settle, in December, 1872, was reappointed judge of the Supreme Court by Governor Caldwell, but resigned in 1876 upon his nomination as candidate for Governor against Vance. He was appointed United States District Judge for Florida in January, 1877, and died in that office 1 December, 1888, in the 58th year of his age. One of his sisters married David S. Reid, Democratic Governor and United States Senator, and another was the wife of O. H. Dockery, Republican candidate for Governor in 1888.

Nathaniel Boyden was born in Conway, Mass., 16 August, 1796. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. He entered Williams College in 1817 and graduated in Union College, New York, in July, 1821. His father was a Revolutionary soldier who died in 1857, being 94 years of age.

Judge Boyden came to Guilford County in 1822. He was admitted to the bar in 1823 and represented Surry in the House of Commons in 1838 and 1840. In 1844 he represented Rowan in the State Senate, and in 1847 he was elected a member of the Thirtieth Congress. He declined reëlection and continued to practice law till raised to the bench. He attended forty-eight courts each year and practiced regularly in twelve counties. He was a member of the State Convention of 1865 and in 1868 was elected as a Republican to the Fortieth Congress. Upon Judge Settle's first resignation he was appointed by Governor Caldwell, in May, 1871, to the Supreme Court. He was then in his 75th year. He died in 1873 after a service of two and one-half years.

William P. Bynum was born in June, 1820, in Stokes County. He graduated at Davidson College with the highest honors, in 1843; he read law with Judge Pearson, with whom he afterwards sat on the Supreme Court, and was admitted to the bar in 1844. His license was the last signed by the lamented Gaston, who died so suddenly. In 1861 he was appointed by Governor Ellis Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second North Carolina Regiment. His future associate on the Supreme Court, Judge Faircloth, was quartermaster of this regiment. Judge Bynum was in the battles around Richmond and at the first battle of Fredericksburg. After the death of Colonel Tew he became Colonel. Early in 1863 he was elected Solicitor and returned home. He filled that position for eleven years, till he was appointed to the Supreme bench on the death of Judge Boyden, and served till the expiration of his term, 1 January, 1879, when he returned to practice in Charlotte, where he died 30 December, 1909, in his 90th year.

William T. Faircloth was born in Edgecombe in January, 1829, and graduated at Wake Forest College in 1854. His means were limited and he taught school in vacation to pay his expenses in college. He studied law with Judge Pearson and was admitted to the practice in 1856 and located in Goldsboro. He served during the war as quartermaster, and surrendered at Appomattox. He was a member of the Convention of 1865, and of the succeeding Legislature, by which he was elected solicitor. He was a member of the State Convention of 1875, as were Judges Avery and Shepherd. In November, 1876, he was appointed by Governor Brogden to the Supreme Court to fill the vacancy caused by the second resignation of Judge Settle. His term expired 1 January, 1879, and he returned to practice in Goldsboro. He was defeated in 1884 for Lieutenant Governor on the Republican ticket, and in 1890 he was the candidate of the same party for justice of the Supreme Court against Justice Clark, and was again defeated. In 1894 he was nominated by the Republicans and Populists and elected Chief Justice. He died suddenly at his home in Goldsboro 30 December, 1900.

William Nathan Harrell Smith, sixth Chief Justice, was born in Murfreesboro in September, 1812. His father was a native of Connecticut, a graduate of Yale and a physician, who removed to this State in 1802 and died in 1813. Judge Smith graduated at Yale in 1834 and studied law in its law school. Among his college mates were Morrison R. Waite, later Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, W. M. Evarts, since Secretary of State; Samuel J. Tilden and Edwards Pierrepont, Minister to England. He obtained license to practice law in North Carolina, but soon removed to Texas. After a stay of six months he returned to this State and served in both Houses of the General Assembly, by which, in 1848, he was elected solicitor and served eight years. He was elected to Congress in 1858 and, tho it was his first term, came within one vote of being elected speaker. He served in the Confederate Congress the four years of the war.

In 1870 he removed to Norfolk to practice law, but in 1872 he removed to Raleigh. Upon the death of Chief Justice Pearson he was appointed Chief Justice in January, 1878, by Governor Vance, and in June he was nominated for Chief Justice and elected for a term of eight years, and eight years later the bench, then consisting of Smith, Ashe, and Merrimon, were reëlected, the first two being then in their 75th year. He died in November, 1889.

The court, from 1868 to 1 January, 1879, consisted of five judges, all of whom were Republicans, except Judge Smith, who was appointed in January, 1878, to fill out the unexpired term of Chief Justice Pearson. The court was reduced 1 January, 1879, to three in number, all Democrats, Judge Smith being reëlected, with Judge Thomas S. Ashe and John H. Dillard as Associates.

Thomas S. Ashe was born in July, 1812, in Alamance and was a great grandson of Judge Samuel Ashe, already mentioned as one of the three judges who constituted the entire judiciary of North Carolina from 1777 to 1795, when he became Governor. Judge Thos. S. Ashe graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1832 in the same class with James C. Dobbin, Secretary of the Navy under President Pierce, and United States Senator Thomas L. Clingman. He studied law under Chief Justice Ruffin and located at Wadesboro in 1836. He represented his county in both branches of the General Assembly and was solicitor from 1848 to 1852. He declined the nomination for Congress in 1858. During the war he was a member of the Confederate Congress, both in the House and Senate. He was a Democratic candidate for Governor in 1868, but was defeated by Governor Holden. In 1872, and in 1874, he was elected to the United States Congress. In 1878 he was elected to the Supreme Court of North Carolina to succeed Judge Reade, and in 1886, was renominated by acclamation and reëlected, being then in his 75th year. He died in Wadesboro in 1887.

John H. Dillard was born in Rockingham County in November, 1819. For a year and a half he was at the University of North Carolina, but left on account of ill health and graduated at the Law School of William and Mary in 1840; he began the practice of law in Virginia, but returned to this State in 1846. In 1862 he entered the army as captain in the Forty-fifth North Carolina Regiment and served one year. In 1868 he removed to Greensboro; in 1878 he was elected to the Supreme Court, but resigned in February, 1881, after a service of a little more than two years. He died in Greensboro 6 May, 1896.

Thomas Ruffin, the fourth son of Chief Justice Thomas Ruffin, was born at Hillsboro in September, 1824. He graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1844. He read law under his father and began practice in Caswell County. He represented Rockingham in the Legislature, and in 1856 he was elected Solicitor, serving four years. In 1861 he entered the army as a captain in the Thirteenth North Carolina Regiment, but in October, 1861, he was appointed by Governor Clark a judge of the Superior Court to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge John M. Dick. He rode the fall circuit, but resigned in March, 1862, being appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of his regiment. He was wounded at South Mountain, September, 1862, and resigned the following March. Later he was appointed a member of the army court in the Army of the West. After the war he was a partner with Judge Dillard and John A. Gilmer at Greensboro, but his health becoming impaired, he abandoned the practice and removed to Hillsboro where he became an insurance agent. In 1875 he returned to the bar and formed a partnership with John W. Graham. Upon the resignation of Judge Dillard in February, 1881, he was appointed to the Supreme Court, and the next year was nominated and elected. He resigned in September, 1883, to resume the practice of law. He died at Hillsboro in 1889.

Augustus S. Merrimon was born in Transylvania County in September, 1830. In 1860 he was elected to the House of Commons, and in 1861 he entered the army as quartermaster with the rank of captain, but was soon elected solicitor and served till the end of the war. He was elected a judge of the Superior Court in 1866, but resigned in August, 1867, rather than obey orders issued by military authority. He was a candidate of the Democratic party for the Supreme Court in 1868, but was defeated with his ticket. He was candidate for Governor in 1872 and was again defeated, but in 1873 he was elected United States Senator and served till 1879. On the resignation of Judge Ruffin in 1883 he was appointed to the Supreme bench and was reëlected at the next election. On the death of Chief Justice Smith, November, 1889, he was appointed by Governor Fowle Chief Justice and served three years till his death in November, 1892.

Joseph J. Davis was born in April, 1828, in what is now Vance County. His grandfather was a soldier in the Revolution. He attended Wake Forest College one year and then went to the University of North Carolina, but did not graduate. He read law under Judge Battle and was admitted to the bar in 1850. In 1862 he entered the army as captain in the Forty-seventh North Carolina Regiment and was taken prisoner in Pettigrew's charge at Gettysburg, 3 July, 1863, and was a prisoner till near the close of the war. In 1866 he was elected to the Legislature from Franklin, and in 1874 he was elected a member of Congress from the Raleigh district and served six years. In 1887, upon the death of Judge Ashe, he was appointed to the Supreme Court and was nominated and elected to the same position the following year. He died in August, 1892.

Alphonso C. Avery was born in 1835 in Burke; graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1857; studied law under Chief Justice Pearson; was admitted to the bar in 1860; served in the Confederate Army, rising to the rank of major; was State Senator in 1866 and a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1875; was elected judge of the Superior Court in 1878 and was reëlected in 1886; upon the increase of the Supreme Court to five in number he and Judge Shepherd were elected the two additional judges and took his seat in January, 1889. At the expiration of his term, 1 January, 1897, he returned to the practice and died in Morganton in June, 1913.

James E. Shepherd was born in Nansemond County, Virginia, 26 July, 1845. During the war he was a telegraph operator in Virginia. He studied law under Judge Battle; was admitted to the bar in 1869 and was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1875. He was appointed to the Superior Court by Governor Jarvis in August, 1882, and, by subsequent election, he continued until promoted to the Supreme Court, where he took his seat 1 January, 1889. On the death of Judge Merrimon he was appointed by Governor Holt, in November, 1892, Chief Justice, but was defeated at the election in 1894, and returned to the practice in January, 1895. He died at a hospital in Baltimore, where he had gone for treatment, in February, 1910.

Walter Clark was born in Halifax County, 19 August, 1846; graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1864; saw service in the war 1861-5 (except one year while at the University of North Carolina), attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. When the number of the Superior Court judges was increased from 9 to 12 in 1885 he was appointed by Governor Scales, 15 April, 1885, one of the additional Superior Court judges and was elected in 1886 by the people. Upon the appointment of Judge Merrimon as Chief Justice he was appointed by Governor Fowle to succeed him as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, 16 November, 1889, and was elected by the people for the unexpired term in 1890. In 1894 he was elected for the full term of eight years, being nominated by the Democratic party and endorsed by the Republican and Populist parties. In 1902 he was nominated and elected Chief Justice and was renominated and reëlected in 1910 and in 1918.

James C. McRae was born in Fayetteville, October, 1838, and was licensed to practice law in 1859. He saw service in the Confederate Army, 1861-65, reaching the rank of major. He was elected to the Legislature in 1874. He became judge of the Superior Court in July, 1882, and at the expiration of his term in 1890 he returned to the bar. Upon the death of Judge Davis he was appointed by Governor Holt, in August, 1892, to succeed him, and was elected for the unexpired term. He was defeated for reëlection by the Republican nominee in 1894, and returned to the practice of law. In 1900 he accepted the position of professor of law at the University of North Carolina, where he died in October, 1909.

Armistead Burwell was born in Hillsboro in October, 1839, the son of Rev. Robert Burwell, the Presbyterian pastor at that place. He graduated at Davidson College in 1859, with first honors, and was engaged in teaching in Arkansas when the war broke out. He served thruout the war with troops from that State, reaching the rank of captain, and was severely wounded in 1864 before Atlanta. He resumed teaching in Charlotte after the war, studied law and was licensed to practice in 1869; he was State Senator in 1880. He was appointed by Governor Holt to the Supreme Court in November, 1892, but was defeated in the election by the Republican candidate in 1894, and resumed practice at Charlotte, where he died in May, 1913.

David M. Furches was born in Davie County in April, 1832. His grandfather, Tobias Furches, was a prominent Baptist preacher. Judge Furches was educated at Union Academy in Davie and studied law under Chief Justice Pearson, obtaining license to practice in the Superior Court in 1857. He located in Mocksville, where he was county attorney, removing to Statesville in 1866. He was a member of the State Convention in 1865; was defeated for Congress in 1872; for the Supreme Court in 1888; and for Governor in 1892. He was appointed judge of the Superior Court in 1875 to succeed Anderson Mitchell, and served till January, 1879. He was elected to the Supreme Court as a Republican and took his seat 1 January, 1894. Jointly with Judge Douglas, he was impeached by the Legislature of 1901 for issuing an order to the State Treasurer to pay out money which had been forbidden by an act of the Legislature, White v. Auditor, 126 N. C., 570. The charge was sustained by a majority of the Senate, but did not receive the necessary two-thirds vote to convict and remove from office. He resumed the practice of law at the end of his term in 1903 and died in 1908.

Judge Walter A. Montgomery was born in Warrenton in February, 1845. He served in the Twelfth North Carolina Regiment, 1861 to 1865, being promoted to second lieutenant in 1864, and was paroled at Appomattox. He was admitted to practice in 1867. In 1873 he removed to Memphis, Tenn., but returned to this State in 1876. In 1894 he was elected to the Supreme Court to fill an unexpired term for two years, and in 1896 he was elected for the full term of eight years. On its expiration he returned to the practice 1 January, 1905.

Robert M. Douglas was born in January, 1849. He was the son of Stephen A. Douglas, who was United States Senator from Illinois and candidate for President in 1860. He was Private Secretary to the Governor of North Carolina in 1868 and Private Secretary to President Grant, 1869 to 1873, and United States Marshal of North Carolina, 1873 to 1883. In 1886, then 37 years of age, he was admitted to the bar; in 1896 was elected to the Supreme Court for the term of eight years, and at the end of his term returned to practice at Greensboro. He died in February, 1917.

Charles Alston Cook was born in Warrenton in October, 1848. He was at the University of North Carolina, but graduated at Princeton in 1870; represented his county in both Houses of the General Assembly; was United States District Attorney in 1889 to 1893. In January, 1901, he was appointed by Governor Russell to the Supreme Court, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Furches, appointed Chief Justice. His term expired 1 January, 1903. He removed to Muskogee, Oklahoma, where he became a member of the House of Representatives, and died in 1917.

Platt D. Walker was born in Wilmington in October, 1849; was a student at the University of North Carolina; studied law at the University of Virginia and was admitted to the bar in 1870; he practiced law in Richmond County and moved to Charlotte in 1876. He was elected associate justice of the Supreme Court, taking his seat 1 January, 1903; was reëlected in 1910 and in 1918.

Henry G. Connor was born at Wilmington, July, 1852; was admitted to the bar in 1873; was a member of the State Senate and House, being speaker of the latter in 1899. He was judge of the Superior Court eight years, 1885 to 1893. He was elected associate justice of the Supreme Court and took his seat 1 January, 1903. Was appointed United States District Judge for the Eastern District of North Carolina, 1 June, 1909, which position he still fills.

George H. Brown was born in Washington, N. C., May, 1850. He was educated at Horner's School at Oxford and was admitted to the bar in 1873. He was judge of the Superior Court, 1889 to 1904, and was elected to the Supreme Court, taking his seat 1 January, 1905, and was reëlected in 1912.

William A. Hoke was born at Lincolnton, 25 October, 1851; educated at private schools; studied law under Chief Justice Pearson and was admitted to the bar in 1872. He was State Senator in 1889, and judge of the Superior Court, 1891 to 1904; elected to the Supreme Court, taking his seat 1 January, 1905, and was reëlected in 1912.

James S. Manning was born in Pittsboro in June, 1859; graduated at the University of North Carolina, where he studied law and was admitted to the practice in 1880, locating at Durham. Was a member of the State House of Representatives in 1907 and State Senate in 1909. He was appointed by Governor Kitchin, in June, 1909, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Connor, returned to the practice of law 1 January, 1911, and was elected Attorney General for term beginning January, 1917.

William R. Allen was born at Kenansville in March, 1860; graduated at Trinity College, N. C.; studied law under his father and was licensed to practice law in 1881, locating at Goldsboro. He represented Wayne in the General Assembly in 1893, 1899, and 1901; he was appointed judge of the Superior Court in August, 1894, but was defeated by his Republican opponent and returned to the practice 1 January, 1895. He was again elected to the Superior Court and served eight years, from 1 January, 1903, when having been elected to the Supreme Court, he took his seat there 1 January, 1911, and was reëlected in 1918.

The Supreme Court of North Carolina, as a separate organization and not merely as a court of conference of Superior Court judges, began 1 January, 1819. It therefore rounded out a century 1 January, 1919. It has had, including the present incumbents, forty judges. The court consisted of three members from 1 January, 1818, to 1868. It was composed of five judges from 1868 to 1 January, 1879; it then consisted of three judges to 1 January, 1889, and since that date of five judges. Of the forty judges Chief Justice Taylor was born in England; Chief Justice Ruffin, Shepherd and Judge Hall in Virginia; Judge Boyden in Massachusetts; the other thirty-five were natives of this State.

Chief Justice Ruffin was in his 83d year when he died, and Judge Manly in his 82d—both after their retirement; but Chief Justice Taney of the United States Supreme Court died in office in his 88th year, soon after delivering the opinion in the Merryman case, and Lord Halsbury is still the highest judicial officer in England, chairman of the Law Committee in the House of Lords, in his 95th year.

Judge Settle was the youngest judge, ascending the bench at 37. Next came the elder Ruffin, Pearson, Murphey, Shepherd, and Clark, who all went on at 43. Judge Furches went on at 62, becoming Chief Justice at 68; Judge Nash at 63, and was in his 72d year when made Chief Justice.

Judge Smith went on the bench at 65, and Judge Ashe at 66, as was Faircloth when taking his seat a second time, after an interval of sixteen years. Judge Boyden was 74 when appointed, and yet served two and a half years. Smith and Ashe were in their 75th year when elected a second time. There is probably no other case of two out of three judges of the highest court of a State being reëlected at such age. The longest service (except the writer's) has been Pearson's, twenty-nine years and three weeks, and the elder Ruffin, nearly twenty-five years (counting both times he was on the bench), and each of these was nineteen years Chief Justice. The writer has been on the Supreme Court since 16 November, 1889.

As to religious persuasion, three have been Roman Catholics, Gaston, Manly and Douglas; two Baptists, Faircloth and Montgomery; four Methodists, Merrimon, Clark, Cook, and Allen; seven Presbyterians, Nash, Reade, Dick, Smith, Dillard, Avery, and Burwell; one Freethinker, and the remaining 23 Episcopalians.

For the first 50 years—1818 to 1868—the judges were chosen for life by the General Assembly. For the last 50 years—1868 to 1918—they have been elected by the people and for terms of eight years.

The Superior Court in 1777 consisted of three members, and notwithstanding the requirement for a Supreme Court in the Constitution of 1776 remained the sole court of higher jurisdiction for 42 years. It was gradually increased from three judges in 1777 to eight judges in 1868, when the Constitution increased the number to twelve. On 1 January, 1879, this number was reduced to nine, which was again increased to twelve in 1885. In 1901 it was increased to sixteen, and in 1913 to 20. In 1915 the State was divided into two divisions and the Superior Court judges were required to rotate by holding successively only the districts in their own division instead of the entire State.

The Superior and Supreme Courts were legislative creations till 1868, the judges being elected by the Legislature for life terms. The Constitution of 1868 made them constitutional officers, elective by the people for terms of eight years. The number of Supreme Court judges is fixed by that instrument, but the Legislature can increase or diminish the number of Superior Court judges. In the event of a vacancy, either on the Superior or Supreme Court bench, the Governor appoints until the vacancy is filled at the next general election.

William Bryan of Craven County, Brigadier General in the American Revolution

By William Hollister

During the time that Ireland was divided into small monarchies or baronies, O'Brien was head of the government of Munster. The celebrated "Hall of Tara" (poem by Thomas Moore) is referred to as having been visited by him in "The Story of Ireland," by Lawless, ch. 8, p. 61. In after years, from various causes, the name gradually changed its orthography to O'Brian, then to O'Bryan, and the competitor for the Irish Crown was John O'Bryan, some account of whom perhaps we find in Grenshaw's History of England. Some time during the latter part of the seventeenth century his five sons, who were under political proscription, left their native land for America. Their names were Council, Edward, John, William, and Hardy. They were compelled to leave their widowed mother and their home of luxury and come as mere adventurers to the new world. Council having died at sea, the remaining four landed at New Bern, N. C. They were bold, energetic men and went at once to work. They began with many others to make what has since become one of the greatest commercial productions of the State—tar. By strict economy and perseverance they soon saved enough money to purchase a negro named "Tom," the first ever owned by the Bryan family. They had dropped the "O" from their name and wrote it simply Bryan. (The above by tradition.)

Fortune smiled upon their labors and ere many years they had purchased as many slaves as they desired and invested their funds in vessels at sea. After this period we know nothing of the original four except Hardy. It is said that the Bryans are descended from Brian Boru, who was for twelve years Monarch of Ireland (about 1014). For reference, see "The Story of Ireland," ch. 8, pp. 60-70.

William Bryan, son of Hardy Bryan (one of the original four), and Sarah Bonner, who was the daughter of Sheriff

Thomas Bonner, was born in Craven County, the date unknown, near Fort Barnwell. He was a large landowner and a very prominent man in the political and military life of his day. His remains lie buried near his old home, and a descendant, Mr. Albert E. Wadsworth, now owns the land. The exact time of his death is also unknown, but his will, made January 8, 1791, and probated in the same year at the March term of court, shows that his death occurred some time in that year, and very early in that year. See Book of Wills A, p. 24, in the "Records of Wills" at the Craven County courthouse, New Bern, N. C.

The first mention we can find of William Bryan in the political life of the province is at a council meeting of the delegates of the province in convention at New Bern, April 3 and 4, 1775. He was a delegate from Craven County, see Colonial Records, Vol. 10, p. 110. On August 21, 1775, at a meeting of the delegates to the Assembly at Hillsboro, called by Samuel Johnson, to which Assembly William Bryan was a delegate, he was made lieutenant-colonel of the New Bern district (see Wheeler's History of North Carolina, Vol. I, p. 72). Colonial Records gives this date as Saturday, September 9, 1775 (Vol. 10, p. 563). Jones's Defense of North Carolina mentions William Bryan as lieutenant-colonel (ch. 8, p. 220).

The New Bern Minute Men, under the command of Colonel Bryan, participated in the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, sometimes spoken of as Brier Creek Bridge, February 27, 1776, which was the first victory to American arms in the Revolution. (See Jones's Defense, ch. 8, p. 339. State Records of North Carolina, Vol. 14, pp. 271, 276-278, 281, 282, 283, and Vol. 13, p. 13.) At Moore's Creek Bridge he figured gallantly. This battle awakened the people of North Carolina to a realization of their true situation. They had begun to see the absurdity of swearing allegiance to a king who had thrown them out of his protection and with whom they were at open war. In a letter written from Halifax, N. C., April 14, 1776, a tourist who had just arrived from Philadelphia thus described the state of affairs, in the News and Observer, dated March 6, 1910:

As I came through Virginia I found the inhabitants desirous to be independent from Great Britain; the same is true in North Carolina. However, they are willing to submit to whatever the General Congress shall determine (General Bryan was a member of this General Congress). Gentlemen of the first fortune in the province have marched as common soldiers, to encourage and give spirit to the men that have footed it the whole time. Lord Cornwallis with seven regiments is expected to visit us every day. All regard and fondness for the King and Nation of Great Britain is gone. A total separation is what they want. Independence is the word most used. For many weeks in letters, newspapers, in conversations, at the firesides and cross-roads, and in public assemblies the people have been discussing the great question. But the crowning arguments in favor of a declaration of independence were the guns of Caswell, Lillington, Ashe and Bryan, at Moore's Creek Bridge, and the black hulks of Sir Henry Clinton's men-of-war as they rode at anchor in the Cape Fear, February 27.

Quoting from Vol. 14, p. 278, of Colonial Records:

The creek was fordable both above and below the camp; and above so narrow that in some places a tree might have been felled over so as to permit men to pass. The camp which, in the absence of General Ashe, had been put in order by General Bryant (as his name is sometimes spelled) and General Elbert faced up the fork; the left nearly touched the creek and the right reached within about half a mile of the swamp that borders upon the Savannah River. In advance about a mile was a piquet of one hundred men which had been divided into several smaller ones with a chain of sentries between each, and in addition an advanced sentry for the whole; in the rear was posted the light infantry with one brass four-pounder near where the bridge had stood. They might have plainly perceived from several proofs that the larger part of the enemy had moved, but did not return to give notice of it. The first intelligence received of the enemy's movements was from an express that was on his way up to General Williamson's, who had scarcely communicated it when a message from Colonel Smith confirmed it. They came down about three o'clock in the afternoon, in three columns three abreast: the center column came down the road (at least the general could not discern the other two so plainly) and began firing at thirty yards distance.

In the words of General Bryan himself, taken from Colonial Records, Vol. 14, pp. 278-280, he says:

> I pointed out that my opinion was that the camp was not properly placed in being so near the bridge. Nevertheless a detachment of four hundred men were sent out that evening under the command of Colonel Caswell to surprise a piquet of the enemy. They passed the creek in a flat near where the bridge had been; on the 28th, which was Sunday, General Ashe (who was chief in command) left camp about ten o'clock in the morning to meet General Lincoln at Williamson's, but without giving me any commands or orders; the duty now falling upon me, I called a council of the field officers and determined for several reasons to move the camp a mile higher up the fork.

He could have wished to encamp across the road, but consulted the convenience of getting water, and found that it was not advisable. He immediately fixed places about three-quarters of a mile in front for the piquets, whilst the camp was further secured by a chain of sentries from the creek swamp across the road, and down the road to the light infantry in the rear; these precautions they thought sufficient for the evening. On Monday, the first of March, Colonel Williams, who was field officer of the day, acquainted General Bryan that the enemy had been on their lines all night. General Bryan, upon hearing this, doubled all the piquets, but had no horse to send out until about twelve o'clock, when Major Ross was prevailed upon, though his men had suffered very much for want of provisions, and their horses for want of forage. Here General Bryan adds how exceedingly uneasy he felt when he considered the long, fatiguing march the men had undergone, how wretchedly they were equipped, and how terribly they needed rest.

By an act of the Continental Congress on May 4, 1776, William Bryan, Esquire, was appointed brigadier general of the militia for the New Bern district. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 10, p. 563.) This accounts for the prominent part that he was enabled to play in the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge.

General Bryan was not the William Bryan that is spoken of in "Governor Tryon of North Carolina," by Marshall Haywood, as is the current opinion, for in that volume we find these words, "The only officer killed was the bearer of the Royal standard, Ensign William Bryan of Craven County. This gentleman was a near kinsman of Brigadier General William Bryan of the Revolution, and belonged to the well-known Bryan family still resident in New Bern." (Reference, p. 129, volume on "Governor Tryon of North Carolina.") These two men have been often confused, but we can see from this that Brigadier-General William Bryan never raised the English King's standard. In 1776, on April 4, the Provincial Congress met at Halifax and elected General Bryan, along with other representative men of Craven County to oppose Royal Government. (See Wheeler's History of North Carolina, Vol. 1, pp. 71-78.) On April 13, 1776, the Congress, then assembled at Halifax, appointed a committee of its ablest men to prepare a civil constitution, with General Bryan as one of the leading men. This Council of Safety then recommended to the people to elect on October 15 delegates for a council that was to meet in Halifax on November 12, 1776, which was to make a constitution of laws that were to serve as a corner-stone for all laws. (See Wheeler's History of North Carolina, Vol. 1, pp. 84-85.) General Bryan was a member of the House of Commons for the years 1780-1781 and 1782-1783. (See County Records of Craven County, p. 122.)

In Colonial Records, Vol. 13, we find a letter written by Governor Caswell to General Bryan in which he says:

> Mr. Hardy Bryan, who was appointed by the General Assembly to supply the several detachments ordered to march from the regiments belonging to your brigade, having declined that service, I am to request that you forthwith direct the commanding officers of the several regiments composing your brigade to appoint some persons to furnish the men marching from their respective regiments with provisions until they reach Halifax, N. C., as this very necessary business must not be neglected.

In Colonial Records, Vol. 14, p. 17, we find a letter written to Governor Caswell from General Lincoln:

> I hope as soon as the furloughs of your nine-months men shall expire they will be forwarded and that your militia will be relieved in time. The enemy lately moved as far as Augusta with, as I am informed, seventeen hundred men. We have a body opposite to oppose their crossing. General Ashe, with General Bryan's brigade, is gone up. It is a matter of great importance that we prevent the enemy from getting into the upper part of the country, from where we draw many of our supplies, in which are many unfriendly persons, and by which our communication with the Indians would be cut off, and they be obliged to turn their trade and receive their supplies through another channel, which would plainly not be to our advantage.

General William Bryan married three times—Mrs. Respass, Miss Green, and Miss Mackey. Miss Green was a daughter of Colonel James Green of the line of Peter Green of Burley Hall, England, and a sister of the Colonel Joseph Green. General Bryan's daughter, Eleanor Bryan, had the earrings torn from her ears by British soldiers. (This by tradition.) One day his wife and daughters were walking to a neighbor's house to call, and were surprised by a ruffian red coat who rushed out of the woods and pulled the earrings out of one of the girls' ears and demanded all of their jewelry. In terror they gave it up, all but one girl named Anne, who refused to take off one of her rings (which happened to be her engagement ring). He drew his sword and declared that he would kill her if she did not. She threw her hands over her head and said with her father's spirit, "I will die before you shall have it." In the midst of this revolting scene it is said that an aide de camp of the British officer rode upon the party just in time to witness this atrocity on the part of some of his soldiers, and immediately struck to the ground with his saber one of those cowardly wretches who died then and there. (This by tradition.)

General Bryan was engaged with his command in frequent collisions with the British forces who were constantly making incursions on the inhabitants of Craven County in the vicinity of Core Creek and Fort Barnwell, his plantation and residence being located near Core Creek at the spot where Mr. Albert Wadsworth now resides. In one of the forays the British force greatly outnumbering his command, they routed Bryan's forces and came near capturing him. By a ruse of one of his faithful slaves, York by name, he was secreted by him and taken to an island in Neuse River near York's home, and regularly fed and taken care of for several days, the negro making his perilous trips to General Bryan always at night. The British entered his dwelling, ransacking every hole and corner to find him, but without success. This so exasperated them that they ordered the family out of the house and burned it to the ground, as found in Colonial Records, Vol. 15, p. 627.

Early one night as York stepped into the road (he had just taken his master's supper to him) he met a band of Tories, some of whom knew York and he knew them. The general was near enough to hear the whole conversation. They asked the negro where his master was, he replied that he did not know. "You are a liar," they said. "Now tell us where he is and we will give you money." (This part, which is traditional, was given the writer by Mrs. J. W. Waters, who has been unable to find out the exact amount that was offered to York.) The negro still contended that he did not know where the general was. Then they offered him his freedom and still he held out. Finally, becoming enraged they threatened to kill him if he would not tell. York told them to kill him, even then they would not find where "Marsa" was. One of them, so goes the account, was going to shoot him, but the captain stopped him, saying, "The poor negro does not know where his master is." So they went on and left the negro undisturbed.

The general afterwards said that he was afraid that they would hear his heart beat, so near were they to his hiding place. The person above mentioned as furnishing this source of information has pointed out the spot where the general was in hiding at the time. York was an honored guest at the homes of all of General Bryan's children and grandchildren, and was often invited up to the sideboard to drink his French brandy out of the cut-glass decanters. Like most of his race, and ours too, York ardently loved intoxicants. He was a worthy negro and lived a respectable life, the general having given him a life estate in lands on the south side of Core Creek, and this land is known to every one at the present time as the "York field."

The Tories, as mentioned above, gave General Bryan trouble in that they burned up all of his property that they could. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 15, pp. 627-8.) This same passage gives account of his revenge, a part of which I will quote:

> After the enemy were in possession of New Bern a couple of days, they evacuated it and came up Neuse Road to our post at Bryan's Mill (this is part of a letter written from General Caswell to Governor Burke) and were very near to surprizing the party there which I had just left under the command of Colonel Gorham, who finding the enemy advancing in front, made every disposition to skirmish with them, thinking his right flank and rear well covered with horse. But on their approach in front the piquets on his right flank began to skirmish. He then found that the horse had not taken post as directed, and ordered a retreat, which he very well effected two miles across Neuse River. The enemy lay but one night there, burnt Bryan's house, Mr. William Herritage's and the Cox's dwellings, and much distressed and abused their families; then moved across the country to Trent River, and have gone toward the "Richlands" of New River. They let us accidently find out that their intentions were to go down the sound and destroy all the salt works. They have taken about fifteen prisoners. Their loss would have been much greater but for the scarcity of our ammunition which prevented my skirmishing to any great extent. General Bryan, the Herritages and Cox's have raised a party and burned up all of the Tories' houses near them. I am exceedingly sorry for the event and dread the consequences. Have given them orders to stop it, but fear that I cannot put an end to it.

This letter was written August 27, 1781.

General Bryan was a trustee of the school at New Bern. In Colonial Records, Vol. 24, p. 607, we find: "The General Assembly appointed a schoolhouse at New Bern. This act was amended in 1784 and the following trustees appointed: Hon. Richard Caswell, Abner Nash, John Wright Starkey, General William Bryan, and Richard Dobbs Speight." He was sheriff and lieutenant-colonel while Caswell was colonel of the regiment during the year 1774-1775. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 21, p. 1072.)

Colonial Records, Vol. 24, p. 387, shows that by an enactment of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina a board of auditors was constituted and appointed in each of the districts of New Bern, Wilmington, Halifax, Hillsboro, Edenton, and two for the district of Salisbury, each board to consist of three members, to be composed of the following persons: James Coor, William Bryan and John Hawks for the district of New Bern (the rest of the names I will not enumerate).

He was appointed by the Provincial Congress to see that Thomas Emery would remove himself from the town of New Bern within ten days to the county of Dobbs, there to remain for the space of two months, on account of undue practices which tended to influence the minds of the people and prevent the militia of Craven County from turning out in defense and protection of the province. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 10, p. 632.)

It seems that his detachment was the center around which the others had their orders issued to them. From Colonial Records, Vol. 8, pp. 675-676, I quote the following:

Colonel Ashe will take command of the army and march with them to Colonel Bryan's, from whence the several detachments will march under the command of their respective commanding officers to their particular counties and be there discharged. The commissary will supply the army with provisions as usual until they get to Colonel Bryan's, and then furnish the commanding officers of the several detachments with a sufficient quantity to serve them to their respective homes. The whole of the artillery and ammunition to be escorted to New Bern from Colonel Bryan's by the detachment under the command of Colonel Leech. The horses taken in battle are to be divided at Colonel Bryan's—one-half to go to New Bern with Colonel Leech, the other half to go to Wilmington with Colonel Ashe, where they are to be sold at public vendue, and the proceeds to be paid to the public vendue.

General Bryan's advice was constantly sought and his opinions highly respected. His appointment on countless committees shows how valuable a man he was to his community in those terrible days, regardless of the numerous other trustworthy positions that were held by him. In Colonial Records, Vol. 10, p. 175, can be found a statement to the effect that he was on a committee for the purpose of preparing a plan for the internal peace, order and safety of the province, and to make such an arrangement in the civil police of the province as may tend to supply in some measure the defect of the executive powers of government, arising from his Excellency's absence. (This refers to the absence of Governor Martin.) This body of men was also to take into consideration the propriety of appointing a committee of safety; the members to compose it, the manner and time of meetings, qualifications of the electors and elected, the number of which these shall consist, etc.; and further to report the necessity, if any there be, of forming other committees in order to relieve the province in the present unhappy state to which it was subjected.

That he was a man of some kindness of heart is proven by the fact that he expressed his desire and willingness to pardon one Reynold McDugall, who was a boy of about eighteen years of age, and condemned, on August 9, 1775, to death for murder. The case was one of pronounced guilt, but owing to the youthfulness of the criminal and the dependence of his mother upon him, General Bryan was in favor of pardoning him. This pardon was granted. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 9, pp. 683-685.)

William Bryan, Church Warden of Christ Parish of Craven County, was, as we can see, an influential man in his church. For reference to his active part in the affairs of the Episcopal Church see the North Carolina Historical and Genealogical Register, Vol. 2, No. 2, and paragraph 11.

He resigned as brigadier-general in 1779. (See Colonial Records, Vol. 13, pp. 754, 755, 793, 807, 808.)

General Bryan owned a large body of land where Tuscarora now stands. He built the mill on Core Creek just west of his home, which was at this time the most famous mill in Eastern North Carolina. The stream afforded water in the greatest drought. It had two saws and two grists, one for corn, the other for wheat.

I desire to emphasize the fact that Brigadier-General William Bryan was not killed in the battle of Alamance. Had he been killed in this battle, which was a battle between the English Colonists and the Regulators, in May, 1771, he certainly could not have been in a position to resign as brigadier-general in 1779. (Colonial Records, Vol. 13, p. 755.) It is generally thought by the majority of people that he met his death in this way. But our hero lived on and made a most heroic stand for his country that he loved so dearly and tried so faithfully to serve, as I have tried to show in the above. And was he not a hero? There were other men in the Revolution that held higher military positions than did he, but he was ever a true and loyal patriot, a highly respected and esteemed general.

For Whom Was Edgecombe County Named?

By Gaston Lichtenstein

It is said that Governor David L. Swain once attempted to count the errors in Wheeler's History of North Carolina. When the amazing figure of one thousand was reached, he put down the book. Whether this story be true or false, John H. Wheeler has squeezed more inaccuracies into a mass of valuable matter than any so-called historian to my knowledge. Yet, with all its faults, the work is worth a great deal to students. Herein they find a multitude of details which offer an unusual stimulus for research in order to prove their truth or falsity.

The first sentence of the chapter on Edgecombe alleges that the county was formed from Craven. For this bit of misinformation the authority cannot be determined. Edgecombe was a precinct from its origin until 1738, when the precincts of the colony became counties. Whether or not Governor Burrington's creation failed to receive legislative confirmation as a county before 1741, the Colonial Records expressly state that Edgecombe was formed from Bertie. Otherwise, what does the following extract mean: "Read a Bill entitled a Bill for an Act Appointing that part of Bertie Precinct which lies on the South Side of Roanoak River to be Establisht a precinct by ye name of Edgecombe."[1] Wheeler's first reference is to Martin's history, but the authority cited simply says that the county of Edgecombe, which had been erected by an order of Governor Burrington in council, was confirmed by law (1741). No mention of Craven is made by Martin. Before entering upon the subject proper, I respectfully ask that Bertie be given credit as the parent of Edgecombe. Thus, one error is disposed of.

Sentence two, of the chapter on Edgecombe, informs us that its name is Saxon, and signifies "a valley environed with hills," and is derived from the Earl of Mount Edgecombe, who, as Captain Edgecombe of the navy, had served with reputation under Admiral Byng, in 1756, at Minorca. How Wheeler could write such a sentence is beyond my comprehension, for he stated at the beginning of the chapter that Edgecombe was formed in 1733. The fight, in which Captain Edgecombe distinguished himself, occurred twenty-three years after Burrington erected the new precinct. How could the Governor name a portion of the Colony in 1733 for a man who "had served" in 1756?

George Edgecumbe, first Earl of Mount-Edgecumbe, was born in 1721. He was twelve years old, therefore, when Bertie precinct lost a big part of its territory. It is true that, in 1756, this nobleman assisted Admiral Byng; it is true, also, that he rose from midshipman to the rank of admiral in the English navy, but the distinguished services of George Edgecumbe could not have been retroactive. As a boy of twelve, he had almost certainly done nothing for which any honor was due him in the Colony of North Carolina.

Richard Edgcumbe, first Baron Edgcumbe and father of the admiral, was born in 1680. In 1733, when Edgecombe precinct was formed, this gentleman enjoyed the friendship of Horace Walpole; in fact, he is said to have been popular with George II because he was shorter than that diminutive monarch.[2] He occupied the position of a lord of the treasury for a number of years and, although politically corrupt in his management of the Cornish boroughs, seems to have left a worthy name in other respects. Walpole, whom he served as a most trusted subordinate, said Richard Edgcumbe was "one of the honestest and steadiest men in the world."

On the 14th day of November, 1732, Captain Burrington, Governor of North Carolina, wrote a letter to the Board of Trade and Plantations concerning Baby Smith. Most of the details are unrelated to the present subject and will be omitted. The lordships were informed that Baby Smith needed an Instructor from a Gentleman in Hanover Square. The Governor continues: "I thought Smith would be at a great loss how to proceed against me. Upon Mr. Ashe's breach of promise in not repairing to London, therefore judged he would want an Instructor, and for Hanover Square I might very well think that a fitt place of Instruction, it was there I used to wait upon two Gentlemen for advise and assistance in my own affairs. The right honourable Mr. Edgcombe, allways generouse, wise and benificent is one of the persons I mean."[3]

Who was Mr. Edgcombe? The generous, wise, and beneficent gentleman was very probably the person whom Royal Governor Burrington selected to honor. As the Chief Executive of the Colony formerly went for advice and assistance to Mr. Edgcombe, it is fair to assume (other evidence being unsatisfactory) that George Burrington showed his gratitude by naming one of the three precincts, erected in the year following the date of the above letter, for his proved friend. But, was the gentleman Richard Edgcumbe?

A search through the Colonial Records reveals the information that on January 7, 1755, a Mr. Edgcumbe sat as a member of the Board of Trade. His fellow members, present at the particular meeting, were: the Earl of Halifax, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Oswald, and Mr. Fane. Although the first baron did not die until 1758, advanced age would be strong evidence to offer that he did not occupy a place on the Board of Trade. His son Richard, second Baron Edgcumbe and elder brother of the admiral, held a number of positions in the service of the English Government, and, like his father, enjoyed the friendship of Horace Walpole. While Richard Edgcumbe, the younger, may have served on the Board of Trade in 1755, he could not have been a friend of Governor Burrington in 1732 because he was then only sixteen years old.

Family history ought to be preserved, at least, through tradition. A considerable amount of matter, in the case of the Edgcumbe family, has been permanently preserved, but the data at my command throw no direct light on Edgecombe County. I wrote a letter to the present Earl of Mount-Edgecumbe and asked for his assistance. He replied kindly enough but could not help me. Therefore, the question is open: for whom was Edgecombe County named?

A sketch of Chief Justice Walter Clark by Mrs. Moffitt appeared in THE BOOKLET of January, 1910.

WILLIAM HOLLISTER

The author of "William Bryan of Craven County, Brigadier-General in the American Revolution," is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister of New Bern, North Carolina. His mother is a Daughter of the Revolution, and, upon request, furnished this interesting sketch. The North Carolina Sons of the American Revolution offered a gold medal to schools and colleges of the State for the best essay on "Brigadier-General William Bryan of Craven County." The offer which was sent out is as follows:

"A GOLD MEDAL FOR BEST ESSAY

"The North Carolina Society of the Sons of the American Revolution offers a Gold Medal for best essay on William Bryan of Craven County, Brigadier General in the American Revolution.

"CONDITIONS OF CONTEST

"1. It will be limited to students of the colleges, high schools, public and private, in the State of North Carolina.

"2. All essays must be original work of the contestants, giving credit by quotations where verbatim copying is resorted to, and referring to book and page from which quotation is made.

"3. Essays must not exceed 3,000 words.

"4. In all essays facts are to be stated as facts and traditions as traditions.

"5. Three typewritten copies are required of each essay, one copy of which is to be sent to Judge S. C. Bragaw, ex-

President of the N. C. S. A. R., Washington, N. C., Mrs. W. N. Reynolds, State Regent D. A. R., Winston-Salem, N. C., and Dr. S. Westray Battle, Asheville, N. C.

"6. These essays must be filed with the above named persons before May 15, 1916.

"7. If several students in a college, or one high school, prepare essays, the best one is to be selected from these by a local contest, or in any other way the school authorities may prefer. Only one essay, the best, from any one college or school can compete in this contest.

R. T. Bonner, Secretary,

Although it was William Hollister's graduating year at Davidson College and he had many outside duties—member Student Council, member Y. M. C. A. Cabinet, on editorial staff of the Davidsonian, member Blue Pencil Club, etc.—his mother was particularly anxious that he should try to win this medal, as General Bryan was his great-great-great-grandfather. He has had two years of medicine at Johns Hopkins and has two more before him.

John Steele

By Archibald Henderson

"North Carolina has produced few individuals," says that astute judge of men and affairs, David L. Swain, in speaking of John Steele, "whose public services offer more interesting topics for history and biography." Modest to a fault, exceptionally sensitive in disposition, he was at once rarely versatile and efficient. In the earliest years of the Republic, with his hand upon the nation's pulse, he numbered among his friends and familiar correspondents such figures as Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Hamilton, Oliver Wolcott, Albert Gallatin, Joseph Habersham, James Iredell, Alfred Moore, Nathaniel Macon, and William R. Davie.

I

John Steele, named after his father's brother, was born at Salisbury, North Carolina, on November 16, 1764. His mother was first married to Robert Gillespie, who was murdered by the Indians in March, 1760. Her second husband was William Steel, Commissioner of the Borough Town of Salisbury. Known to history as Elizabeth Maxwell Steel, she endeared herself to her country by presenting to General Nathanael Greene, in the darkest hour of his career, her savings of years for the public service.

John Steele received his early education at the "English School" in Salisbury of which his mother thought so highly. An important influence was exerted upon young Steele during his earlier years by Dr. Samuel Eusebius McCorkle, the husband of his half-sister, Margaret Gillespie. As a youth, Steele attended the famous Latin School, Clio's Nursery, near present Statesville, North Carolina, opened by the Rev. James Hall about 1775. Under the influence of McCorkle and Hall, who were inspired by the teachings of Nassau Hall and the Revolutionary zeal of John Witherspoon, Steele early exhibited a deep love of country and a flaming passion for liberty. At the age of thirteen, against his mother's will, he enlisted in the Continental Army; and soon afterwards his mother is writing to him as follows: "Since you have chosen that manner of life, it would give me the greatest pleasure to hear of your acquitting yourself with honor and faithfulness to your country."

After the expiration of his military service, young Steele returned to Salisbury and established a mercantile business, which doubtless often sent him on business visits to Cross Creek, near present Fayetteville, the economic center of the Scotch mercantile trade. Here he formed the acquaintance of the well-known merchant, Robert Cochran. Attracted by the charms of Mr. Cochran's daughter-in-law, Mary Nesfield, he successfully pressed his suit and was married to the woman of his choice on February 9, 1783. In a letter to his uncle, Ephraim Steele, at Lancaster, Pennsylvania (Salisbury, April 24, 1787), John Steele writes: "Mr. McCorkle's family, my mother's and my own are well. I have had two children but was unhappy to lose one last summer, as well as my old friend and benefactor, Robert Cochran of Fayetteville, with whom I was concerned in trade. Since his death I have conducted the business alone with tolerable success. Goods retail high in this place. The great quantity of paper money which circulates through this state is a heavy drawback upon our prosperity."

John Steele early displayed not only unusual capability in commercial enterprise, but also marked talent as a student of public affairs. On May 5, 1784, he was chosen Assessor for the Town of Salisbury; on March 12, 1787, he was qualified as Town Commissioner; and for many years he held the office of Justice of the County Court of Rowan. His conspicuous interest in public affairs, together with his general popularity, soon brought him into public notice. In 1787, at the age of twenty-two, he was sent to the House of Commons as the representative of the Town of Salisbury. "Though his attention had been devoted to mercantile and agricultural pursuits," observes Moore, the historian, "he developed a strength and clearness in his address that were astonishing." The public confidence reposed in young Steele was demonstrated by his election to represent the town in the convention, held for the purpose of considering the propriety of adopting the new Federal Constitution, begun at Hillsborough on July 21, 1788. A remarkable testimony to Steele's ability is the fact that, in a membership of two hundred and eighty, he is ranked by Iredell's biographer with the great leaders, James Iredell, William R. Davie, Samuel Johnston, Richard Dobbs Spaight and Archibald Maclaine, as one of the half-dozen most prominent Federalists in the convention. "He was universally regarded," says McRee, "as a very enlightened politician, and accomplished gentleman." By Hubbard, Davie's biographer, Steele is described as diligent, clear-sighted, and for his knowledge of men and skillful marshaling of their forces a valuable ally of the cause of the Constitution. When Steele was instrumental in having the new county formed out of Rowan named Iredell, James Iredell wrote him a letter of hearty thanks (Edenton, February 7, 1789), in which he said: "My opportunities of rendering any public service have been very few; but no man's heart is more warmly disposed to the public interest than mine. I think neither you nor myself could give stronger proofs of it, than in supporting with all the earnestness in our power a Constitution which, in my opinion, gave us the only chance of being rescued from the dreadful evil of universal anarchy, which is as far removed from true liberty as despotism itself." Again Steele represented Salisbury, both in the Legislature of 1788 and in the Convention of 1789, which met at Fayetteville in November and by a large majority ratified the Federal Constitution.

II

On account of the prominent part he had played in political affairs, Steele was put forward by the people generally, irrespective of faction, in the Salisbury District, and at the age of twenty-five elected to the First United States Congress, which convened at Philadelphia on March 4, 1789.[1] During the two terms of his service in Congress, Steele won real and merited distinction. His speeches were marked by great earnestness, delivered with dignity, and stamped with the authority which rests on knowledge. Popularly classed as a Federalist, who had won his seat as an active supporter of the Constitution, he showed himself to be neither a partisan supporter of administrative measures nor a colorless recorder of Federalist opinion. In reality, his was the attitude of the statesman who is above party. The great veneration he felt for Washington was tempered by the consciousness that Congress, out of an excess of admiration for this great man, had "by law invested him with powers not delegated by the Constitution, which would have been intrusted to no other." Steele greatly admired the genius of his friend, Alexander Hamilton, as administrator and financier. Yet he was by no means an unqualified adherent of Hamilton; and on important occasions, he opposed measures of Hamilton's which he regarded as unwise and impractical. Supported by his colleagues, he opposed Hamilton's plan of the assumption by the Union of all the debts of the States contracted in gaining American independence, on the ground that it was impossible to adjust the account equitably. In conformity with well-considered views, he supported the bill for establishing a national bank, which was so vigorously fought by Jefferson and his followers on the ground of unconstitutionality. In the fight on the Secretary of the Treasury, he voted uniformly in indorsement of Hamilton, being supported by Williamson and opposed by Ashe and Macon. In recognition of the legal insight of Steele, he was appointed, along with Gerry and Williamson, to bring in a bill to adapt to the State of North Carolina the judiciary laws of the United States.

[1]As North Carolina did not ratify the Constitution of the United States until November 21, 1789, the State had no representation until the second of the three sessions of the first Congress. John Steele took his seat on April 19, 1790. His colleagues in this Congress were John Sevier, Timothy Bloodworth, John B. Ashe, and Hugh Williamson, the last a Federalist. Both the Senators from North Carolina, Samuel Johnston and Benjamin Hawkins, were Federalists.

It was principally through the instrumentality of John Steele and Judge Spruce Macay, the Mayor of the town, that President Washington, on his tour of the South in 1791, was so elaborately greeted and hospitably entertained by the municipality of Salisbury. In his diary, May 30, 1791, Washington records: "In about 10 miles at the line which divides Mecklenburg from Rowan Counties, I met a party of horse belonging to the latter, who came from Salisbury to escort me on. . . . I was also met 5 miles from Salisbury by the Mayor of the Corporation, Judge McKay, and many others;—Mr. Steele, Representative for the District, was so polite as to come all the way to Charlotte to meet me. . . . Dined at a public dinner given by the Citizens of Salisbury; & in the afternoon drank tea at the same place with about 20 ladies, who had been assembled for the occasion." In his address of welcome, the Mayor voiced the delight of the inhabitants in Washington's visit and instanced "the fervor of the universal welcome which the grateful people gave him." Washington's reply, which expressed by indirection his satisfaction over the action of the people of the Salisbury district in sending Steele, a Federalist, to the first United States Congress, contains these words: "The interest you are pleased to take in my personal welfare excites a sensibility proportional to your goodness. While I make the most grateful acknowledgment for that goodness, allow me to observe that your own determination, coöperating with that of your fellow-citizens throughout the Union, to maintain and perpetuate the federal government, affords a better assurance of order and public prosperity, than the best meant endeavors of any individual could give."

The following letter, which Steele wrote to Governor Alexander Martin (New York, May 17, 1790), during the session of the first Congress, is interesting as throwing light upon important political questions of the day:

SIR:—A great variety of business at present occupies the attention of Congress, and tho the sessions commenced with the year, there is little probability of adjourning previous to the 1st of August.

The President is dangerously ill of a pectoral complaint, the opinion of the faculty is against a recovery. Before this attack he was engaged in extending his appointments to the several departments of No. Carolina and the ceded Territory, but the secrets of his cabinet are retained in such absolute darkness, that were I to attempt to give you information, it would be mere conjecture. If this stroke should unfortunately prove fatal, the Vice President will be in office, by virtue of his present appointment, until the 4th of March, 1793. An event melancholy indeed. Shou'd it happen, perhaps it wou'd have been better for the United States, that Gen'l Washington had never been chosen; for relying on his virtue and abilities, Congress have in repeated instances, by law, invested him with powers not delegated by the Constitution, which I suppose would have been intrusted to no other man. These powers can never be recalled without the consent of his successor in office, or an union of sentiment, which in these factious times, is not to be expected.

The assumption of the State debts, we are told, will be brought forward next week in a new dress. This is intended, either to gull some of the more moderate members; or by delaying the progress of public business constrain some of the Georgians or No. Carolinians (who are anxious to return) to obtain leave of absence. Or the Eastern members have been tampering with the Pennsylvanians, by offering the permanent residence of Congress to Philadelphia. This surmise I have taken occasion to speak of to those who are most zealously attached to the interest of that city, holding out as a threat that if they did desert us, we shou'd most assuredly desert them; so that eventually Philadelphia might lose more by the bargain than she would gain.

A bill has lately been passed by the Senate, and sent to us for concurrence, designed to prohibit any further intercourse with Rhode Island, until she shall ratify. It is tyrannical and arbitrary in the highest degree, and the author of it, indeed the Senate by passing it, seem to have lost sight of that political connection which once existed, and of that spirit of moderation, and mutual forbearance, which ought forever to subsist between governments related as they are to us, as well as between individuals. That State, tho' comparatively small, was not backward in the late Revolution. She performed essential services in the common cause. She sustained important sacrifices, and is therefore entitled to respect. How far in her present politicks she has been wrong, or how far right, are questions which time only can decide.

I hope the bill will not pass our house. If it shou'd, there will be a proof given to the world, of the sandy foundation of all human friendship, or political connections.

I have the honor to be,
Sir,
With sincere attachment,
Your Excellency's
Most Humble Servant,
JNO. STEELE.

As an evidence of the popular appreciation in which his services in the first Congress were held, may be read today the following account in the North Carolina Chronicle; or, Fayetteville Gazette, of November 8, 1790:

On the last day of the supreme court at Salisbury, the grand jury appointed their foreman, William Dent, esquire, Major John Crump and Major Henry Terrell, a committee to wait upon John Steele, esquire, with the following address:

SALISBURY DISTRICT, SUPERIOR COURT,
September Term, 1790.

The grand jury for the district aforesaid, sensibly, and deeply impressed with the importance of the duties of their representatives in the congress of the United States, return their thanks to the honourable John Steele, esquire, for his spirited support, and faithful attention, to the interests of this state, during the last session of congress.

The grand jury would conceive themselves wanting in attention to the proper interests of the government in general, and this State in particular, should they withhold this testimonial of their approbation of Mr. Steele's conduct, as the representative of a free people.

During his two terms in Congress, Steele took an active part in debate. Upon the question of the ratio of representation, he made extended speeches, advocating one Representative for every thirty-five thousand persons; and pleaded for a recognition of the lessons taught by experience in America, rather than the following of precedents from Great Britain, which did not properly apply to American conditions. He spoke in favor of Nathaniel Macon's plan for protecting the "infant industry" of cotton raising; and in view of the fact that this "infant industry" was one day to become the greatest industry in America, it is interesting to recall Steele's declaration that at this early date "the farmers of North Carolina had gone largely into the cultivation of that article."

Not given by disposition to indulgence in oratorical flights, or perfervid declarations that he was a champion of the "Liberties of the People," Steele showed himself to be singularly fairminded and impartial. He was an independent in politics at the moment when political parties were just beginning to assume definite confrontation. A striking illustration of his independence and his transparent honesty is afforded in the case of his firm opposition to Clark's resolution for calling out the militia to protect the Southwestern frontiers. Familiar with conditions on the Indian border, Steele did not hesitate to tell the truth, espousing the unpopular side without regard for the effect such action might have upon his own political fortunes. His subsequent defeat for a third term in Congress was probably due to the speech in which the following veracious though unpopular assertion was made:

> That the white people are sometimes and often the aggressors (in conflicts between the whites and the Indians on the frontier) did appear from documents then on the files, that some such instances had come within my own knowledge, and as the information then to be acted upon only came from one of the parties, a recollection of what human nature is under the influence of passion, should cause the house to receive it with caution.

On December 19, 1792, Steele introduced a resolution for reducing the military establishment of the United States, assigning two motives for his action: to afford more effectual protection to the frontiers; and to obviate the necessity for new taxes. On December 28, 1792, and on January 5, 1793, he made able and extended speeches in advocacy of his resolution. Drawing illustrations from flagrant instances of the failure of army regulars, who were only mechanical in their discipline, to cope successfully with Indian tactics, Steele eloquently asserted the superiority of the frontiersmen as militia in engaging and conquering the savage foe. Worthy of record is his tribute to the militia, and in especial to the great Indian fighters of the Old Southwest:

> Who fought the battle of Bunker Hill? Who fought the battles of New Jersey? Who have fought the Indians so often with success, under Generals Wilkinson, Scott, Sevier, and others? Who marched in 1776 under General Rutherford, through the Cherokee nation, laid waste their country, and forced them to peace? Who fought the battles of Georgia, under Clark and Twiggs? Who fought the battles of South Carolina, under the command of an honorable member now present?
> Who fought the ever-memorable battles of Cowpens, Kings Mountain, Hanging Rock, Blackstocks, the pivots on which the Revolution turned in the Southern States? In short, who fought all the battles of the Southern States, while we had a mere handful of regular troops, scarcely the shadow, much less the reality of an army?
>
> They were all fought by freemen, the substantial freeholders of the country; the men attached to the Revolution from principle; men who were sensible of their rights and fought for them.

III

While the North Carolina representatives were unanimous on the motion to reduce the army, as amended by Williamson, and in opposition to extending the Indian war, Steele's advocacy of these measures was adduced against him to his damage by political opponents in proof of his alleged lack of sympathy with the people of the West and indifference to the sufferings of the borderers at the hands of the Indians. During his stay in Congress, he wrote numerous political letters to leading men of his district, irrespective of party; and transmitted a wealth of information on national affairs to his constituents through the medium of Dr. John Sibley, editor of the Fayetteville Gazette. In answer to the charge of having been independent in politics, Steele vigorously retorted: "I represented the division, and was not elected by or for any particular party. Being the representative of all, I attempted to give information to all . . ." In the days of his congressional service in Philadelphia, Steele became a close friend of Alexander Hamilton; and through this connection, his acquaintance with Washington, by whom he was held in high regard, and the bent of his own political ideas and convictions, he gradually became more deeply imbued with Federalist principles. His correspondence with Hamilton is rich in historical interest; and the following extract from one of his letters (Steele to Hamilton, Salisbury, March 17, 1793) is illuminating:

> To support a constitution which has cost the best people in the Union so much pains to establish, to counteract the nefarious designs of its enemies, and to rally round the Federal government as a Standard where our most precious liberties are well secured, is the duty of men who possess talents, property, reputation, or influence. Of this, if ever I doubted, my doubts have been removed by late political occurrences, none of which are more alarming to the friends of systematic and stable government, than the unwise, indecent, and poisonous opposition, to the declaration of neutrality. The decided and patriotic part which the President took on that subject, has raised him some enemies here, as well as in Philada.; but it has increased the veneration and love of all the sober-minded well-wishers of national prosperity.
> Our state elections are over. I have accepted a seat in the Assembly. Colo. Davie, whom you have often heard me speak of, is also in, and if there can be a necessity for such a measure, I am sure the Legislature wou'd express in decided terms an approbation of the wisdom which dictated that Proclamation. Though I am sure that success wou'd attend such a motion through both houses, yet I cannot help questioning the propriety of an individual state interfering at all, either to approve or censure the administration of the general Government.
>
> No step shall be taken in relation to it without due deliberation, and advice wou'd not be unacceptable. Neutrality is the wish of every good man in this State who has sense enough to know his country's solid interest, and the president may be assured of this, without our troubling him to answer a profusion of addresses.

IV

In a letter to the Grand Jury of Salisbury in 1792, Steele gave an account of his stewardship in Congress, and expressed his intention of permitting his name to be presented before the Legislature as a candidate for the United States Senate. At the session of the Legislature at New Bern in November and December, 1792, he was a prominent candidate for Senator, along with William Blount and Alexander Martin. Largely as the result of violently partisan accusations by Montford Stokes, to the effect that Steele had fashioned his views "on the political complection of his correspondents," that his principles were "all aristocratical," and that he was the devoted adherent of Alexander Hamilton, Steele was defeated—Martin winning the seat by a small majority.

In 1795, Steele was put forward as the candidate of the Federalist party for United States Senator. His Republican opponent was Timothy Bloodworth. It was locally urged against Steele by leading opponents, in especial by Joseph McDowell of Quaker Meadows, that he "was considered by a great many members from the Southern States . . . to have joined the aristocratical party" and to have become an ardent adherent of Alexander Hamilton. In addition to this local opposition, outside influence, notably that of Pierce Butler of South Carolina, was brought to bear against Steele in question of his "steady Republicanism." Much to the chagrin of the Federalist leaders, who had a poor opinion of Bloodworth's ability, Steele was defeated in consequence of the charges so dexterously advanced by his opponents. During this period, Steele remained prominently in the public eye. On January 8, 1794, he was appointed, by Governor Richard Dobbs Spaight, Major General of the Fourth Division of Militia of North Carolina. In 1794 and 1795, he represented the Salisbury District in the North Carolina House of Commons, and played an influential part in the proceedings.

Thomas Benbury—A Brigadier General of the American Revolution

By Emily Ryan Benbury Haywood
(Mrs. Hubert Haywood)

Thomas Benbury was born in 1736, at his father's home, "Banbury Hall," five miles from Edenton on the Albemarle Sound. He was the son of John Benbury, born 1707, died 1774, his wife's name being Mary. He was a member of the court in 1756, and also a vestryman of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton.

The grandson of William Banbury, who married Jean or Jane Minsey, and is first mentioned in the court records of Chowan County in 1684, when he had a deed recorded as a gift from his mother-in-law, Mrs. Dorothy Minsey, at which time he was said to be twenty-one years old. This was about twenty-five years after the first permanent settlement of North Carolina. He was a member of the first vestry of the Church of England ever held in North Carolina, which was that of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton, on which he served continuously until 1708, and was also a member of the first vestry in North Carolina, that of 1705, which ever voluntarily assessed itself for the benefit of the Church.

Tradition says that the family of Banbury, as it was originally called, settled first on the James River, later moving to Nansemond County, Va.; finally migrating to Albemarle, in the Province of Carolina, as this whole section was then known. The supposition is that the family originally emigrated from in, or near, the town of Banbury, in England, which is only a short distance from London and the town of Oxford. Just when the final change in the name was made is not known, but it must have been during the life time of William, for in 1701, as a member of the vestry of St. Paul's Parish, it is written Banbury, but in his will he signs himself William Benbury, and, so far, there appears to have been no further use of the original form. It was a common custom among the early Colonists to vary the spelling of a name. For more than a hundred years Banbury or Benbury Hall remained in the family, until finally in the course of time it passed into other hands, and its name was changed to "Athol," by which name it is now known. It is owned by Mr. Julian Wood, of Edenton, N. C., whose wife is the granddaughter, seventh in descent, from its original owner.

Thomas Benbury married Thamer Howcott in 1761, who lived only a few years, dying in 1765, leaving two children, Samuel, who died early, and Richard. In 1769 Thomas Benbury married Betty _____ for his second wife. She lived only a short while and left no children. As were his father and grandfather before him, he was a churchman and a vestryman of the Parish of St. Paul's, also a member of the Edenton Lodge of Masons. He was connected by ties of kinship and association with all the leading men of the State, and by his intimate friends was called "Old Tom." He was a zealous and active member of all public affairs, and as the people were growing restive under British rule and "Taxation without Representation" was growing to be an ever-increasing anxiety and cause of unrest among them, he became an early and ardent advocate of their cause and aligned himself with them at the earliest opportunity, and from that time until the final independence of the American Republic he was one of the most zealous and ardent of patriots.

In 1774, August 22, a call was issued by the freeholders of the Parish for a meeting to be held at the courthouse in Edenton, for the election of delegates to the first Provincial Congress, to be held in New Bern on the 25th of the same month in defiance of the royal authority. This meeting was well attended, and resolutions were passed expressing in no uncertain terms their indignation against the Government of Great Britain, the British Parliament, the imposition of taxes, duties, etc.

The Boston Port Bill was also denounced. The delegates appointed were Samuel Johnston, Thomas Oldham, Thomas Jones, Thomas Benbury, Thomas Hunter, and Joseph Hewes, all of whom attended.

At this Congress Thomas Benbury, Governor Johnston, and Joseph Hewes, were appointed from this district to present these resolutions to the General Congress in Philadelphia. Thomas Benbury was also a delegate to the other Provincial Congresses held in New Bern, Hillsboro, and Halifax. He was a member of the vestry which wrote and signed what was called the famous "Declaration of Independence" of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton, June 19, 1776, but which was afterwards said to be a copy of one prepared by the State Congress in 1775, though many have doubted this. The following is a copy, as it appears on the Church Register in Edenton:

ST. PAUL'S PARISH, 1776.

Be it remembered that the Freeholders of St. Paul's Parish, met the Sheriff at the Court house in Edenton, on Monday, the eighth of April, then and there pursuant to an Act of the Assembly, did elect the following persons to serve as Vestrymen for one year. (Agreeable to resolve of the Provincial Congress, held at Halifax on the second of April, and qualified agreeable thereto), Vizt, Thomas Bonner, William Boyd, Thomas Benbury, Jacob Hunter, John Beasley, William Bennett, William Roberts, Richard Hoskins, David Rice, Aaron Hill, Peletiah Walton, William Hinton.

We, the Subscribers professing our Allegiance to the King, and acknowledging the Constitutional executive power of the Government, do solemnly profess, testify and declare that we do absolutely believe that neither the Parliament of Great Britian, nor any member or Constituent Branch thereof, have a right to impose Taxes upon these Colonies, to regulate the internal Policy thereof, and all attempts by Fraud or Force to establish and exercise such Claims and Powers, are Violations of the Peace and Security of the People, and ought to be resisted to the utmost, and that the people of this province, singly and collectively, are bound by the Acts and Resolutions of the Continental and Provincial Congresses, because in both they are freely represented by persons chosen by themselves, and we do solemnly and sincerely promise and engage under the Sanction of Virtue, Honor and the Sacred Love of Liberty due our Country, to Maintain and support all and every, the Acts, Resolutions and Regulations, of the said Continental and Provincial Congresses to the utmost of our power and ability. In Testimony whereof we have hereto set our hand this 19th day of June, 1776.

In 1778, we find him acting with a friend, Rob Smith, in the capacity of agent for the State, in the reception of some cannon which had been ordered from France by the General Government, at the request of the two States, Virginia and North Carolina; though judging from the interesting correspondence which follows, Mr. Benbury and Mr. Smith acted first, and sought permission of the Governor afterwards. The two cannon, now mounted and placed on either side of the Washington Monument in the southern end of the Capitol Square in Raleigh, are a part of that consignment. The correspondence between Governor Caswell, Thomas Benbury and Rob Smith relative to the same, found among the letters taken from the Governor's letter book and published in the Colonial Records, will prove interesting:

EDENTON, 19th November, 1778.

Captain Berritz of the ship named the "Heart of Jesus," arrived here some time in the month of July last. On his arrival, he wrote a certain Mr. Holton, he says, indeed we know he did. He likewise wrote to Congress what he should do with the cannon he had on board, say twenty eight 24 pounders, to which he never received any answer; but about a month ago, a gentleman from Virginia produced an order for one half, or twenty two of the cannon, for that State, and at the same time exhibited an extract of a Resolve of Congress, by which it appears the contract for the cannon had been applied for by the delegates of the two states, Carolina and Virginia, and was granted. The State of Virginia are to have twenty two of the cannon, and our State Twenty-three. The contract made by the Agents in France is to pay 150 lbs. of tobacco, for every 100 lbs of iron cannon, for the credit of the State, we have thought it our duty to receive the cannon. The Captain proceeds with the other two and twenty that is ordered to South Quay, where the tobacco is ready for him, for the Virginia half or share. We wish to know if we have acted right in what we have done (we have told your Excellency our motives). What should be done with the cannon, and to know what way the Captain can be paid the tobacco. His time has been some time out, and he will lay after his return from South Quay, at the demurrage, we believe of 50 lbs per day. We hope we will be excused for the freedom we have taken, and are with every sentiment of respect and regard and esteem,

Your Excellency's mo' ob'. and very humb. srvts,

THOS. BENBURY.

In reply is an order from Governor R. Caswell to Robert Smith, Esquire, Kinston, 3d of December, 1778:

SIR: Please to deliver Captain Willis Wilson eight 18 pounders for the use of Fort Hancock, and if there are any among the guns purchased for the State and received by you and Mr. Benbury, any which will suit his ship, please also deliver them. I have not yet been favored with the account of the weight of the Guns, or any of your favors, since the return of your Express respecting the cannon,

I am, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

R. CASWELL.

Judge Clark, in the Colonial Records, says:

The ship referred to was the Caswell, Captain, John Easton. She was ordered to proceed immediately to Ocracoke. "You are to receive from Mr. Robert Smith eight 18 pounders, lately imported there from France, and received by Messrs. Smith and Benbury for the use of this State. If there are any other Guns in Mr. Smith's possession that will be useful in your ship, apply to him and he will deliver them," etc., and this letter from Thomas Benbury and Robert Smith to Gov. Caswell, in reply, dated Edenton, 10th of December, 1778:

SIR: We received yours of the 24th November. The reason of your not hearing from us before is explained in Mr. Smith's letter. Captain Barrets proceeding to South Quay with his vessel left us no Invoice of the Cannon left here. We have examined the Cannon, but from the Swedish marks we cannot determine the quantity of Tobacco that the State will have to pay, but as near as we can guess, we have to pay from one hundred and sixty thousand weight of tobacco. As to that part of your Excellency's letter relative to purchasing Tobacco, we can only answer that we can purchase none here, but as the meeting of the General Assembly is near at hand, we doubt not but they will be able to remove every difficulty, and prevent the demurrage, if any, from being considerable against this State. The cannon shall be delivered as your Excellency ordered, and your commands in every other respect concerning them shall be faithfully obeyed.

We are with respect, sir,

THOS. BENBURY.

ROB. SMITH.

Thomas Benbury was a member of all the Provincial Congresses and Speaker of the House of Representatives from 1778 to 1782. He was a member of the Edenton District Committee of Safety, Major of State Troops, and Paymaster of the Fifth Regiment and Commissary General. In 1779 he was made Brigadier-General, and it is said that he took part in the Battle of Great Bridge. These were very trying times to the colonists, and the following letters also from the Colonial Records, reflect in part, at least, a portion of their anxieties, and are therefore worthy of being reproduced.

The first is from Colonel Alexander Martin and Thomas Benbury to Governor Nash:

To his Excellency ABNER NASH, Esquire, Captain General, Governor, etc., etc.

SIR: In answer to your Excellency's message of this Day. We, the members Convened, beg leave to hint to your Excellency as our private Sentiments the following Important Objects First, That we advise your Excellency to call out from such Districts and Counties such a Body of the Militia, not exceeding one half to be proportioned as you think necessary, and that they march immediately, by the shortest and most convenient route to join Gen'l Caswell, or to any other post you shall please to appoint, their serving three months, to commence from their rendezvous at Headquarters, or such post as may be Directed, unless sooner disbanded, shall be recommended to the General Assembly as a Tour of Duty.

We further advise your Excellency to order the Commanding Officers of the several Counties, out of which you may order the Militia, to appoint Contractors or Commissioners to provide provisions, spirits, and other necessaries for the use of the Militia to be called into Service, and the members here present engage their Faith and Honor, to use their Influence in the General Assembly that an adequate, full and ample satisfaction be made for the same, and that Col. Long be directed to immediately purchase, or in case of refusal, to impress all the Iron pots and Kettles now at Wilcox's Iron Works and forward them immediately to Camp.

That your Excellency be requested to issue a Proclamation requiring all Deserters and Refugees belonging to this State, to repair to Headquarters, and that the Commanding Officers of the respective Counties, exert themselves in carrying the purport of such proclamation into Effect, in apprehending and forwarding such persons immediately to Headquarters.

We shall continue a few days at this place, for the purpose of forming an Assembly, in which Time we will gladly and cheerfully advise your Excellency, in any matter that may tend to the Defense of the State.

In the present Critical Conjunction, we submit to your Excellency's prudence, all other matters respecting the Defense of this State. By order and in behalf of the members present,

ALEX MARTIN.
THOMAS BENBURY.

Again we find in the Colonial Records, this correspondence from Thomas Benbury to Governor Nash, in which he signs himself in his official capacity as Brigadier-General:

EDENTON, 22nd October, 1780.

To His Excellency, ABNER NASH,
New Bern, N. C.

SIR: I have at this moment received information that the Enemy are landing forces at Kemps Landing in Virginia. I have in consequence of this information sent an Express in order to learn their movements. I have also dispatched letters to the different Colos. in my district, requiring them to have their regiments equipped in the best manner they can, and to hold themselves to march on the shortest notice. I have likewise written to Col. Long for one thousand stand of arms, if to be spared, we not having one Hundred good Muskets in the district. I hope all this will meet your Excellency's approbation and that you will direct how I am further to proceed. My information says there are sixty Sail of vessels, but the number of troops not known.

I am to inform your Excellency that last Monday, two large Gallies, with sliding Gunter mast, as was judged, about sixty men in each, came over Roanoke Bar, and went through the marshes. On receiving this information, the town of Edenton sent out a Boat to reconnoitre, which is not returned. The town have been under an alarm ever since this information came up. We this moment learn that fireing was heard last night, the occasion of which we know not, but Conjecture it to be some of the homeward bound vessels, who have fallen in with these Gallies. I shall keep your Excellency informed from time to time of what happens in this quarter.

I have the Honor to be, Sir,
Your most obedt and very humble Servt.,
THOS. BENBURY,—B. G. P. I.

Again in a few days this letter follows:

EDENTON, 30th October, 1780.

To Governor ABNER NASH,

SIR: I have this moment by the return of one of my Expresses received a Letter from Colo. Senf, a copy of which I take the liberty to inclose. You will see by that letter we are in a fair way to be overrun by the Enemy. This morning I was informed by express that three hundred last evening of the Enemy had marched for South Quay and that one thousand were under march for this place from Suffolk. We have made a stand at Norfleet's Mill, about thirty five miles from this place, with the few Militia that will turn out, but I am sorry to say, I never saw, or expected to see men so backward, they seem ready made slaves. The town turn out pretty well, but they are worn out, they expect all to be ruined. I left camp this morning, and am this moment to set out on my return. For God's sake, for the sake of that Liberty we are contending for, give us every aid you can.

I have the Honour to be,
Your Excellency's Most Obedt Servt.,
THOMAS BENBURY, B. G.

With the close of his services as Representative to the General Assembly in 1782, General Benbury was succeeded in 1783 by his son Richard, while he took a much needed rest and enjoyed the quietude of his home for a few years, until 1790, when he was appointed Collector and Inspector of the Port of Edenton by General George Washington, who was then President. This was at that time a position of great importance, though today it hardly seems possible. This position he held until his death February 5, 1793, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, leaving one child, his son Richard. He left a large estate and was the owner of a number of slaves, as we learn from the first census of the Government, taken in 1790, in which he is registered from the Edenton

District as the head of a family and the owner of eighty-eight slaves. His burial place is not known, but is supposed to be at "Banbury Hall" where a portion of the old graveyard is still preserved.

Several of these commissions, signed by Washington, and countersigned by Thomas Jefferson, also an autograph letter from Alexander Hamilton, informing him of the appointment, are still preserved by the family.

With the story of patriots such as Thomas Benbury—and there were many others—it would be disloyalty if we of later generations did not give to North Carolina "Our hearts' utmost devotion," as Judge Gaston wrote in his beautiful hymn to our State, and unite with him in saying:

> Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her;
> While we live, we will cherish, protect and defend her.

The Trial of Henry Wirz

By Sarah W. Ashe

[Recently the fact that Henry Wirz was tried by a court-martial—or rather by a commission of military officers—and put to death for alleged cruelties to Federal prisoners confined at Andersonville, has been given prominence, and he has been held up as one who perpetrated outrages against the rules of civilized warfare and in disregard of the dictates of humanity. Because of the revival of that slander on him that likewise involves the fair name of the Confederate Government and of the people of the South, we devote space at this time to a true statement of the matters connected with his trial.—Editor.]

In the fall of 1865, several months after the overthrow of the Confederacy, there took place in Washington City two judicial murders, which will ever stain the annals of the conquering states—that of Mrs. Surratt, hung for complicity in the assassination of Lincoln, and that of Henry Wirz—a physician and man of high character—who, six months after the war was ended, was tried by court-martial, convicted and hanged on the charge of having conspired with Jefferson Davis and other Confederate leaders to torture and murder prisoners under his care.

The innocence of Mrs. Surratt has been fully shown in the account of her trial written by her lawyer, the Hon. Reverdy Johnson of Maryland; but the facts in regard to Wirz are not generally known.

When in the shadow of death Captain Wirz was offered life if he would implicate Jefferson Davis in these alleged atrocities. He preferred death to a life won by such means, and died pleading that his name be rescued from infamy.

The highest officers of the Confederacy were indicted with him; and through them, the Southern Confederacy. As a sacred duty to itself, therefore, the South should bear always in mind the truth concerning the trial and death of the martyred Wirz—a stranger in our land—who threw in his lot with us, served the Confederacy faithfully, and paid for his fidelity with his life.

That there should have been any suffering among prisoners on either side during the war must ever be deplored; that there should have been any prisoners to suffer is entirely due to the war policy of the North.

The conduct of the Confederate Government towards its prisoners is above reproach and was ordered by the truest feelings of humanity. Its policy was fixed by law. By act of Congress passed at the beginning of the war, it was provided that prisoners of war should have the same rations, in quality and quantity, as Confederate soldiers in the field. By an act passed afterwards, all hospitals for sick and wounded prisoners were put on the same footing with hospitals for sick and wounded Confederates. This policy was never changed. Whatever food or fare the Confederate soldiers had, whether good or bad, full or short, the Federal prisoners shared equally with them.

Although deprived of medicines through the policy of the Federal Government, and with but a scant supply of provisions and clothing, her ports blockaded and her resources exhausted, the prison records of the South were better than those of the North. The death rate in Southern prisons was less than nine per cent; that in Northern prisons was twelve per cent. And, great as was the mortality at Andersonville, it was four per cent less than at the Federal prison of Rock Island, Illinois, notwithstanding the fact that the Northern authorities had abundant means of alleviating the sufferings of their unfortunate prisoners. From the first the South desired an exchange of prisoners. The Federal Government, on the other hand, affected to consider the secession a rebellion, upholders of the Confederacy as rebels and traitors, her men-of-war piratical vessels, and her sailors pirates, and, as such, the latter, when captured, were loaded with irons and condemned to be hanged. Only by the protests of European governments and threats of retaliation by the Confederate Government was it deterred from its proposed course.

While in 1862 a cartel was arranged, by which all prisoners were to be exchanged man for man, and the excess on either side paroled, by which all prisoners would have been released—after the battle of Gettysburg, when the North held the majority of prisoners, this was discontinued. From this time it became the fixed policy of the Federal authorities to make no exchanges.

"If we begin a system of exchange," wrote General Grant, "which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight on until the whole South is exterminated."

In the spring of 1864 the Confederate Government found itself, in consequence of this policy of nonexchange, overburdened with prisoners, and established a large camp for them at Andersonville, Georgia, a spot selected on account of the mildness of climate, abundance of water, and the absence of malarial conditions.

Every provision possible was made for the health of the inmates. The law requiring prisoners and guards in all southern prisons to fare in food alike was rigidly observed, the rations issued daily being the same in quantity and quality as those issued to our soldiers in the field. They consisted principally of corn meal and beef or bacon, the only food obtainable at the South at that time. This food, even at best, was unpalatable to men who had never used corn meal in any form before, and diarrhea, the usual result of its use by those unaccustomed to it, was produced. This disease, hard to arrest at best, became unmanageable for want of proper remedies, and the sufferers fell easy victims to more serious troubles—camp gangrene and scurvy. These diseases attacked guards and prisoners alike—the officers, Wirz, Winder, Colonel Gibbs, and Dr. Stephenson, all having gangrene. To cope with these diseases medicines were necessary, and the Union Government had made medicines contraband of war. Medical stores, even when the private property of physicians, were destroyed in conquered sections, and persons attempting to send medicines South were arrested and cast into prison, and we pleaded in vain to be permitted to buy them with gold or cotton.

All that humanity could suggest was done. Wheat, sugar, coffee, and other luxuries, when obtainable, were provided for the use of the sick, and well prisoners were billeted on the families near Andersonville, where they would be in less danger of contagion.

The Confederate War Department took steps for a thorough inspection of the camp. All well prisoners were removed to other places and by September only the sick were left at Andersonville. By this time the virulence of the diseases had begun to abate, the death rate having been greatest during August.

In charge of this hospital was Dr. R. R. Stephenson, surgeon in chief, with a staff of thirty assistants. Colonel Gibbs was commandant of the post, and Capt. Henry Wirz had charge of the prison proper.

Henry Wirz, the officer in charge of the Andersonville prison, was a physician by profession, and was born in Zurich, Switzerland, in 1822. He emigrated to America in 1849, and first settled in Louisville, Kentucky, removing subsequently to Louisiana, where he practiced his profession until the beginning of the war between the States. When the war broke out he was one of the first to enlist in the Southern cause. He served as a private in the memorable battle of Manassas, where he received a wound in the arm, injuring the bone, from which he suffered up to the day of his execution. After leaving the hospital in Richmond he was placed as a clerk in Libby Prison. Afterwards he was commissioned as captain in the Confederate Army, and was appointed deputy marshal, and in 1862 he visited all the prisons in the South as inspecting officer.

The high esteem in which he was held at Richmond is evidenced by the fact that he was appointed in the latter part of 1863 by President Davis to carry secret dispatches to the Confederate Commissioners—Mr. Mason in England and Mr. Slidell in France—and to all the financial agents of the Confederate Government in Europe. On his return, in January, 1864, he was assigned to duty under Brig.-Gen. John H. Winder, who, on April 4, 1864, placed him as superintendent of the Confederate States military prison at Andersonville, Georgia, where he was still on duty at the close of the war.

A man of tried integrity and much experience in prison work, he was well fitted for a position of such responsibility. Indeed, he was appointed to that post on account of the efficiency shown while engaged in like work at Richmond.

He had been from the opening of the war a loyal subject to the land of his adoption, and had from the first been called to positions of trust and high honor, requiring delicacy in handling, to which he was particularly adapted by reason of his foreign birth, high character and other qualifications, and in all of these he had served satisfactorily.

In his private life Captain Wirz is described as being an affectionate husband and father, and the kindest of men, one careful of the comforts of his servants and of the animals about him, and so solicitous about the welfare of the prisoners in his charge that he often deprived his children of their daily cup of milk—one of their few luxuries—for the benefit of the sick in the hospital.

Colonel Hammond, one of the prison inspectors sent to Andersonville, made a special study of its commandant, Captain Wirz, and leaves us this description of him:

> Major Wirz was at this time about forty years of age, and was a trained soldier; a little below medium height, slight of figure and lean almost to emaciation, with dark hair and brown eyes; direct in manner and expression, and active and alert in movement. He impressed me as one peculiarly fitted for the details of military administration and control. His right arm had been mutilated near the wrist, caused by a fragment of a shell in an engagement near Baton Rouge, Louisiana, incapacitating him for active field service. He was at my side during my visits to the sick and dying in the hospital and while passing among the scarcely less wretched inmates of the stockade. At night he went over the prison records with me, explaining minutely the needs and deficiencies of each department, and when I was on the point of leaving Andersonville he implored me, with tears streaming from his eyes, to urge upon the authorities at Richmond the absolute necessity for more and better food for the prisoners, for medicines, tents and lumber, and recommended that I should advise that they should send as many of the prisoners as could be furnished with transportation to Richmond or Savannah, and there turn them over unconditionally to the Federal authorities.

Colonel Hammond mentioned how Wirz passed, unarmed and unattended, with him through every part of the stockade, without receiving any unkind expression or threatening gesture; and, when questioned whether he had no fears for his personal safety, he replied: "They know I am doing my utmost for them."

As the war proceeded and the death struggle of the Confederacy grew more tense, the difficulty of holding and caring for the prisoners at Andersonville became, of course, much greater. Again and again Commissioner Ould proposed that each government should send its own surgeons to care for its own men, and that these surgeons should distribute such money, food and clothing as might be provided for them. No notice was taken of these propositions.

On the appearance of disease in Andersonville Commissioner Ould was directed again to urge the exchange of these prisoners, and to offer to buy medicines from the Federal authorities exclusively for their use, making offer to pay cotton, gold or tobacco for them, and even two or three times the prices for them, if desired, agreeing also that these might be brought into the prisons by the United States surgeons themselves and distributed by them. No method was left untried to induce the Federals to accede to an exchange. Commissioners were sent; Lee and Vice President Stephens interceded. By advice of the prison officials the prisoners themselves memorialized the Federal Government, praying to be released—all without effect.

In the meantime some of the prisoners at Andersonville had been sent to Washington to plead their own cause. It was of no avail. President Lincoln refused to see them, and they were made to understand that the interest of the Government required that they should return to prison and remain there.

Offer was now made to release all these prisoners without any equivalent if the Federal authorities would receive them. In August the whole body of men, 6,000 in number, at Andersonville was offered without any equivalent, and they were delivered to the Federal commander in Florida, who declined to receive them, and so they had to be brought back to their prison camp.

To turn the attention of the northern people from this war policy the accusation of deliberate cruelty was brought against the South. At the end of the war, therefore, feeling against the South was very bitter, and to satisfy this demand for vengeance a victim was needed.

In direct violation of the terms of Johnston's surrender, Captain Wirz, a paroled Confederate officer, who, assured of safety, lay at home sick and suffering from an unhealed wound, was arrested, separated from his wife and children, whom he never saw again, and hurried to Washington City, where he was confined in the Old Capitol Prison.

After several months spent in arranging the court-martial and finding witnesses, Captain Wirz was arraigned on two charges: conspiracy and murder. Indicted with him as co-conspirators, in a plot to torture and murder prisoners of war, were Robert E. Lee, Jefferson Davis, Seddon and others, all of whose names, except that of Lee, appear on the findings of the court.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, August 23, 1865.

A special military commission is hereby appointed, to meet in this city at 11 o'clock a.m., on the 23d day of August, 1865, or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the trial of Henry Wirz and such other prisoners as may be brought before it.

DETAIL FOR COMMISSION.

Maj.-Gen. L. Wallace, U. S. Volunteers.
Brevet Maj.-Gen. G. Mott, U. S. Volunteers.
Brevet Brig.-Gen. John T. Ballier, Colonel Ninety-eighth Volunteers.
Brig.-Gen. Francis Fessenden, U. S. Volunteers.
Brevet Brig.-Gen. G. W. Geary, U. S. Volunteers.
Brevet Gen. L. Thomas, Adjutant-General U. S. A.
Brig.-Gen. E. S. Bragg, U. S. Volunteers.
Brevet Col. T. Allcock, Lieutenant-Colonel Fourth New York Volunteers.
Lieut.-Col. I. H. Stibbs, Twelfth Iowa Volunteers.
The commission will sit without regard to hours.

BY ORDER OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Before the military commission thus convened in violation of the Constitution, which requires that every man held for a capital offense be tried before a jury and after presentment by a grand jury, Henry Wirz was tried on the charge as specified in the first Special Order, No. 524, of having conspired with Robert E. Lee, Jefferson Davis, James A. Seddon, Howell Cobb, John H. Winder and others, to torture, injure and murder the Federal prisoners held by the Confederates at Andersonville, Georgia. He was accused, under thirteen separate specifications, of shooting the prisoners, punishing them cruelly in irons and stocks, of poisoning them with impure vaccine matter, of pursuing them with bloodhounds, of using a dead line, of furnishing insufficient food and impure water, and of murdering, in cold blood and with his own hand, thirteen of these helpless men.

In answer to these charges Wirz put in pleas to the effect that he had been paroled by General Wilson; that he denied the jurisdiction of the court to try him; that, war being over and civil law restored, there was no military law under which he could be tried. He moved to quash the charges for vagueness as to time, place and manner of offense; that he had been put on trial on August 21st, and that the court had been adjourned without his agency or consent, and that he should not be arraigned as before; and, finally, he claimed discharge, because, as an officer in the Confederate Army, he was entitled to the terms agreed to between Generals Sherman and Johnston upon the surrender of the latter.

All these pleas being overruled except the second, the prisoner pleaded not guilty, and the trial proceeded until November 4, 1865, when, Wirz having been found guilty on all the specifications but three, the following order was issued:

GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL—ORDER NO. 607.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 6, 1865.

Before a military commission which convened at Washington, D. C., August 23, 1865, pursuant to paragraph 3, Special Order No. 453, dated August 23, 1865, and paragraph 13, Special Order No. 524, August 22, 1865, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, D. C., and of which Maj.-Gen. Lewis Wallace, U. S. Volunteers, is president, was arraigned and tried Henry Wirz.

Finding.—The commission, after having maturely considered the evidence adduced, find the accused guilty, as follows:

Of specification to charge 1, guilty, after amending said specification as follows: In this, that the said Henry Wirz did combine, confederate and conspire with them, the said Jefferson Davis, James A. Seddon, Howell Cobb, John H. Winder, Richard B. Winder, Isaiah H. White, W. S. Winder, S. Reed, R. R. Stephenson, S. P. Moore, _____ Keer (late hospital steward at Andersonville), James Duncan, Wesley W. Turner, Benjamin Harris, and others whose names are unknown, maliciously and traitorously and in violation of the laws of war, to impair and injure the health and to destroy the lives of a large number of Federal prisoners, to wit, 45,000 soldiers, etc.

In like manner the court-martial found Wirz guilty on all the principal specifications on which he was tried, two-thirds of the court concurring.

As the result of this trial Henry Wirz was, on November 6, 1865, sentenced to be hanged, and four days later, on Friday, November 10th, the sentence was carried into effect.

It will be noticed that, in both the charges and specifications and in the finding of this court, not Captain Wirz alone, but many of the most prominent officials of the Confederacy were included. Their fair name stands or falls with his.

Consider the language of Chipman, Judge Advocate, in summing up:

"Whilst the evidence adduced convicts Wirz of contributing directly to the death of over ten thousand Union soldiers, and, with his own hand and by his direct order, committing thirteen individual murders, the evidence also presents the horrible fact that he was but an instrument in the hand of Jefferson Davis, James A. Seddon and other prominent rebels, and, while Wirz suffered deservedly, there are those yet unpunished more richly deserving an ignominious death."

None of the others was ever brought to trial, though all could easily have been produced.

The court having been convened to convict, the ordinary forms of justice were dispensed with. All evidence against the defendant was received and that in his favor excluded. The defendant's counsel was denied access to records open to the counsel for the prosecution. Witnesses were intimidated, others forbidden to testify, and at the outset of the trial an important witness for the prisoner was arrested and sent to jail.

Men of high social standing from Georgia and other Southern States were subpœnaed by Wirz's counsel and went to Washington, ready and eager to testify to his character and humane conduct towards the Union prisoners, but were not allowed to do so.

The Confederate Commissioner of Exchange, General Ould, and the Federal Commissioner, General Mulford, were prepared to give evidence of the earnest desire of the Southern authorities for exchange of prisoners, but were not called upon.

On the trial the reports of Drs. White and Stephenson were suppressed, and garbled extracts from those of Dr. Jones and of others were used. The reports of Imboden and Hammond were taken from them and they were not permitted to testify.

As part of the defense it was intended to show the brutal treatment of prisoners in northern prisons, and that systematic cruelty was practiced for the purpose of forcing them to take the oath of allegiance. The names of witnesses by whom it was intended to prove these things were handed to Mr. Baker, assistant counsel to Judge Advocate Chipman. None of these witnesses appeared; the subpœnas for them were never issued, having been suppressed by the Judge Advocate on the gronud that "it was not proper that such testimony should see the light."

Chipman afterwards admitted that he refused to have subpœnas issued for some of the "rebel functionaries whose testimony was considered important to the defense." Among the men whose testimony was thus rejected was General Lee, whose simple word would have gone far to prove to the world the truth.

Still many of the prisoners desired to do him justice and would gladly have testified in his favor if permitted. A letter from one of these to the New York News, fully exonerating Wirz, may well stand as a type of evidence refused.

Of all the witnesses only fifteen could be brought to swear that Wirz was ever guilty of murder. It was proven that all of those swore falsely, some for money, some from malice, some from love of notoriety.

Of those men alleged to have been murdered, the names of very few were given, and not one man could be identified. Yet such testimony was received. Some swore to acts committed by Major Wirz at Andersonville when he was actually absent in Augusta on sick leave.

The chief witness, the man whose testimony was most relied on, a miserable, perjured wretch, received a Government appointment at the beginning of the trial in return for his evidence to come. He claimed to be a Frenchman, a kinsman of Lafayette. He proved to be a German deserter from a Federal regiment and probably never was at Andersonville at all. To such testimony did the unfortunate Wirz owe his death.

No crime was too horrible to be imputed to him; and the pictorial papers were ablaze with illustrations of his imagined atrocities. The South, impotent even to protest, looked on in horror, while Wirz, conscious of having done only his duty as a humane officer and Christian gentleman, could find no words to express his amazement.

In Washington none dared to speak in his favor. His accusers were "patriots," his friends "traitors." So odious did those bent on his destruction make him that the consul-general from Switzerland refused to receive the money some offered for his aid, and the unhappy man was forced to ask assistance to meet the necessary expenses of the trial from the New York News. His lawyers at last resigned the case in despair of aiding him and unwilling to bear longer the odium attached to their position; and only one, the noble-hearted Louis Schade, remained faithful to him. He stood by him to the last, without expectation of reward or hope of saving him; and, two years after Wirz's death, when he thought the public mind might be calm enough to receive it, he published a letter, giving the most trustworthy account of the trial now in existence.

Captain Wirz, the man so foully calumniated, was in no conceivable manner responsible for the condition of things at Andersonville. A subaltern officer, placed as guard of a prison, he had no power to alter the existing conditions. The nature of the food, the number of inmates and the lack of comforts were as totally beyond his control as was the heat of the southern sun; and, far from being the fiend he was portrayed to be, the kindliness and humanity of his nature are attested by all those who knew him. It is proved by the unimpeachable testimony of Dr. Stephenson, General Imboden, and others who were with him at Andersonville that he was always most solicitous for the welfare of the prisoners in his care; that he deeply deplored their sufferings and did all in his power to alleviate them. We find that, by letters and reports, he sought to bring the state of affairs at the camp to the notice of the proper authorities, suggesting and urging the trial of such remedies as occurred to him to be practicable. Except for about three weeks in August, 1864, when, gangrene having attacked an old wound in his arm, he was sent to Augusta by order of his physician, he was never absent from his post of duty, but was engaged day and night with the other faithful surgeons in attending to the needs of the sick and dying. Every prison inspector would have testified to these things had it been permitted.

Yet one last chance of life was to be offered Wirz. "On the night before the execution," says his lawyer, Louis Schade, "some parties came to the confessor of Wirz, Rev. Father Boyle, and also to me, one of them informing me that a high cabinet officer wished to assure Wirz that, if he would implicate Jefferson Davis with the atrocities committed at Andersonville, his sentence would be commuted. He requested me to inform Wirz of this. In the presence of Father Boyle, I told Wirz next morning what had happened. The Captain simply and quietly replied: 'Mr. Schade, you know that I have always told you that I do not know anything about Jefferson Davis. He had no connection with me as to what was done at Andersonville. If I knew anything of him I would not become a traitor against him, or anybody else, even to save my life.' With his wounded arm in a sling, the poor prisoner mounted, two hours later, the scaffold. His last words were that he died innocent. The 10th day of November, 1865, will, indeed, be a black stain upon the pages of American history. Not even a Christian burial of the remains of Captain Wirz was allowed by Secretary Stanton. They still lie side by side with those of another acknowledged victim of the military commission, the unfortunate Mrs. Surratt, in the yard of the former jail of this city."

Far from his native land and kindred, and apparently forsaken by the land of his adoption, surrounded by enemies whose every look spoke execration, Wirz lingered in prison alternating between hope and despair and hardly recognizing himself in the monster whose crimes were being blazoned to the world. His cup of woe was very full.

Near the end of his trial he wrote a letter of appeal to President Johnson, in which his innocense of crime and his simplicity of soul speak for themselves. He protests his innocense. "I am charged with crimes so heinous," he says, "the mere thought of them makes me shudder. Truly when I pass in my mind over the testimony given I sometimes almost doubt my own existence. I doubt that I am the Captain Wirz spoken of. I doubt that such a man ever lived, such as he is said to be, and I am inclined to call upon the mountains to bury me and hide my shame. I have erred as all other human beings, but of those things of which I am accused I am not guilty."

No appeal could avail to save one doomed from the first to die—a vicarious sacrifice for the imputed crimes of the South.

Four days later Wirz was released from suffering, and he passed from the jurisdiction of an earthly tribunal, where malignity had usurped the place of justice, to that higher judgment seat, before which the unjust judge and the innocent victim must alike appear.

John Steele

(Concluded)

V

As early as 1793, Steele was under consideration for national preferment. His talents were especially appreciated by Hamilton, who remained in correspondence with him. The fact that Steele, in 1792, though under thirty years of age, had been prominently pressed for the Senate, and again in 1795 had been the candidate of his party for the Senate, gave him strong claims to recognition by Washington, who was well acquainted with him and had a very favorable opinion of his ability. Upon the resignation of John Davis of Massachusetts as Comptroller of the Treasury, John Steele was appointed to that office, his commission bearing the date July 1, 1796.

Before taking up in more detail the career of Steele as Comptroller of the Treasury, some quotations from the correspondence of Steele and Hamilton may throw interesting sidelights upon important events and issues of the time. In a letter to Steele (Philadelphia, October 15, 1792), Hamilton makes a noteworthy pronouncement upon the presidential situation, which is of especial interest for its reference to Aaron Burr, Hamilton's evil genius.

> Mr. Adams is the man who will be supported in the Northern and Middle States by the friends of the Government. They reason thus—"Mr. Adams, like other men, has his faults and his foibles—some of the opinions he is supposed to entertain, we do not approve . . . but we believe him to be honest, firm, faithful and independent—a sincere lover of his country—a real friend to genuine liberty; but combining his attachment to that with the love of order and stable government. No man's private character can be fairer than his. No man has given stronger proofs than him of disinterested and intrepid patriotism. We will therefore support him as far preferable to any one who is likely to be opposed to him."

Who will be seriously opposed to him—I am yet at a loss to decide. One while, Governor Clinton appeared to be the man. Of late there have been symptoms of Col. Burr's canvassing for it. Some say, one or both, of these will be played off as a diversion in favour of Mr. Jefferson.

I do not scruple to say to you that my preference of Mr. Adams to either of these characters is decided. As to Mr. Clinton, he is a man of narrow and perverse politics, and as well under the former as under the present Government he has been steadily since the termination of the War with Great Britain opposed to national principles. My opinion of Mr. Burr is yet to form—but according to the present state of it, he is a man whose only political principle is to mount at all events—to the highest legal honors of the Nation, and as much further as circumstances will carry him. Imputations not favorable to his integrity as a man rest upon him; but I do not vouch for their authenticity.

There was a time, when I should have balanced between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Adams; but I now view the former as a man of sublimated and paradoxical imagination cherishing notions incompatible with regular and firm government.*

On April 8, 1793, Edmund Charles Genet, the accredited representative of the new French Republic, landed at Charleston. It was with a feeling little short of consternation that the American people noted his extraordinary activities in enlisting seamen, commissioning officers, and fitting out privateers, for the unconcealed purpose of preying upon British commerce. One week after Washington issued his Proclamation of Neutrality (April 22, 1793), Genet was at Salisbury, North Carolina, on his way northward; and the following extract from a letter written by Steele to Hamilton (Salisbury, April 30, 1793) contains a vivid pen-picture at close range of Citizen Genet at this stirring period in American history:

This morning Mr. Genet, the French Minister, set out from this place for Philadelphia. . . . You have heard much of this citizen, no doubt, and therefore anything of him from me will seem superfluous; but as I am writing of the man that we are all afraid of, permit me to say that he has a good person, fine ruddy complexion, quite active, and seems always in a bustle, more like a busy man than a man of business. A Frenchman in his manners, he announces himself in all companies as the minister of the republic, &c., talks freely of his commission, and like most Europeans, seems to have adopted mistaken notions of the penetration and knowledge of the people of the United States. He is, or affects to be, highly gratified by the affectionate treatment he has thus far experienced from the Americans, except of Charleston, where an insult was offered to a French seaman, which he attributes to the merchants, who seem in his opinion almost wholly attached to the British. The minister, notwithstanding his good-nature, spoke angrily of this insult, and for a moment deviated from his system, which I think is to laugh us into the war, if he can. The best informed men in this State, who are wholly disinterested, continue uneasy, from an apprehension that our political connection with France, and our commercial intercourse with England, will place the United States in a delicate, if not a dangerous situation during the war.

I have often said, on proper occasions, that the friends to neutrality and peace would find in the Secretary of the Treasury an able and zealous friend. . . . The best men in this country rely chiefly upon your talents and disposition to avoid the rocks which lie upon the right hand, and upon the left, ready to dash our young government to pieces upon the least unskillful pilotage.

VI

On November 15, 1796, Steele sent to the General Assembly of North Carolina his resignation both as Justice of the Peace for the county of Rowan and as Major General in the Fourth Division of the Militia of North Carolina—in consequence of the assumption of his new duties and of his removal to Philadelphia. Early in July of that year he had formally taken charge of the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in which office he had been preceded by Nicholas Eveleigh of South Carolina, Oliver Wolcott, Jr., of Connecticut, Jonathan Jackson of Massachusetts, and John Davis of Massachusetts. For the next six years, Steele assiduously devoted himself to the onerous and taxing duties of that office.

The accounting system of the Treasury Department, designed to concentrate all accounting agencies in that department, was created by Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury. In the original organization of that department, by the act of September 2, 1789, provision was made by the first Congress for a Secretary of the Treasury, an assistant to the Secretary, a Comptroller, an Auditor, a Treasurer, and a Register. Under the terms of that act, it was the duty of the Comptroller to superintend the adjustment and preservation of all public accounts; to examine all accounts settled by the Auditor and certify balances arising thereon to the Register; to countersign all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, which were warranted by law; to report to the Secretary the official forms of all papers to be issued in the different offices for collecting the public revenue, and the manner and form of keeping and stating the accounts of the several persons employed therein; to provide for the regular and punctual payment of all moneys which may be collected and to direct proceedings for all delinquencies of officers of the revenue and for debts due the United States.

Steele took up his quarters in Philadelphia at Francis's Hotel; and in a letter to his wife, written shortly after his arrival in Philadelphia, he thus describes the routine of his daily life:

> It will no doubt be some satisfaction to you to know the nature of my office duties, and other minutiae relative to my situation. The papers are kept in a large house in Chestnut Street, about the center of the city. The Secretary of the Treasury and his clerks occupy the lower story, the comptroller and his clerks the rooms of the second story, and the Register of the Treasury and his clerks the third story. . . . Under my direction there are thirteen clerks and a doorkeeper, and indeed there is business enough for the whole. Writing, writing, writing in this department is the whole duty of man, and at this you know I can do a reasonable share. I go to the office every morning after an early breakfast, continue there until three o'clock, dine, and after dinner return to business again until sunset or dusk. The clerks are all at liberty after three o'clock, tho' some of them return and do business in the afternoon from choice. These are allowed an additional compensation.

In the first days of his residence in Philadelphia, he wrote his wife: "In leisure books shall be my companions"; but it was not long before his duties became so onerous that he was kept regularly at his office until nine o'clock in the evening. "Even on Sundays," he says, "I have not leisure to go to church, except now and then when I understand a person of particular eminence is to preach. Besides other vast cares upon my mind, not one dollar can go in, or out of the Treasury of the United States without my name and that of the Secretary of the Treasury."

An interesting picture of social life in Philadelphia and in Washington, during the early sessions of Congress in the two capitals, are found in the letters of General Steele and his daughter, Ann Nessfield, written home from time to time to Mrs. Steele at Salisbury. Mrs. Steele seldom accompanied her husband to either place; and her associations with Philadelphia were saddened by the death of her infant son, whom she lost there in 1798. A few brief extracts from the letters must suffice to give us a glimpse or two of the social happenings of the day. A corner of Steele's heart, revealing his deep and intense love for his wife—the "Polly" of his letters—is portrayed in the following extract from a letter to her, written from Philadelphia (January 31, 1793), in which he mentions dining with Washington:

> I dined to-day at the President's in a very large company of ladies and gentlemen. On such occasions, without you, I feel like Captain O'Blunder, "Alone in the throng." The truth is, I feel every day more and more disposed to believe that there is no happiness to be found out of a man's own house. Any mortal who thinks that honor and fame will confer that inestimable boon called happiness, in the end like Solomon will find himself grossly mistaken. Believing in that opinion I rejoice with all my heart that my political course is almost finished. . . . The President today asked me to drink a glass of wine with him. This is considered here a great honor. It may be so; but I would have been more highly gratified in drinking a glass with my own dear Polly.

During the year 1801, General Steele was accompanied to Washington by his sprightly and witty daughter, Ann Ness-field; and they took quarters at a Miss Beall's in Georgetown. A few quotations from her letters home carry the piquancy of interest which attaches to experiences associated with personages of historic note. Writing to her mother on November 4, 1801, she says: "I dined at Mr. Madison's both last Sunday and today—nothing uncommon in any of the dinners—not a bit better than your own, and in no more style. . . . As for fashions, every thing is Crazy Jane, and the more you can imitate a crazy person the more fashionable you are." On Christmas day, 1801, she writes: "In the morning we visited the Roman Catholic Chapel in this place (Georgetown), and were entertained with a great quantity of show but very little substance. We returned home to dinner, and drank tea with Mrs. Orr from whence we have just returned. . . . I was in company with Mrs. Murry (William Vans Murray?) the evening before last and must positively give you a description of her head-dress. Well, it was a colored cotton handkerchief, red and spotted with yellow. . . . I don't know what to call it for it would be highly improper to call it a handkerchief." At times, too, Ann wrote with precocious solemnity of her father's affairs; and the following extract must be regarded as only partially explaining the reasons which actuated General Steele in his retirement from office. "The other evening," writes Ann to her mother, not long before her father resigned the Comptrollership of the Treasury, "I had a long conversation with Papa respecting his resignation and I have concluded that it is better for him to retire from public business. He says that as we are situated now we spend all his salary and it will appear very singular if we should continue to live, part of the family in Carolina and the other part in Washington; and as to our living, all of us, here, it is out of the question, for we could not even live comfortably on less than five thousand dollars, which is just twice as much as his income."

One of the most fascinating memoirs of the period is The First Forty Years of Washington Society, as portrayed by the family letters of Mrs. Samuel Harrison Smith (Margaret Bayard). In a letter (July 5, 1801) to his sister, Mary Ann Smith, Mr. S. H. Smith draws a vivid picture, in which Steele incidentally appears and Jefferson is, of course, the central figure.

I cannot deny myself the pleasure of passing a few minutes with you, chiefly to draw a picture, which I know will give your patriotic heart delight, a picture of Mr. Jefferson in which he was exhibited to the best advantage. About 12 o'clock yesterday, the citizens of Washington and Geo. Town waited upon the president to make their devoirs. . . . We found about 20 persons present in a room where sat Mr. J. surrounded by the five Cherokee chiefs. After a conversation of a few minutes, he invited his company into the usual dining room, whose four large sideboards were covered with refreshments, such as cakes of various kinds, wine, punch, &c. Every citizen was invited to partake, as his taste dictated, of them, and the invitation was most cheerfully accepted, and the consequent duties discharged with alacrity. The company soon increased to near a hundred, including all the public officers and most of the respectable citizens, and strangers of distinction. Martial music soon announced the approach of the marine corps of Capt. Burrows, who in due military form saluted the President, accompanied by the President's March played by an excellent band attached to the corps. After undergoing various military evolutions, the company returned to the dining room, and the band from an adjacent room played a succession of fine patriotic airs. All appeared to be cheerful, all happy. Mr. Jefferson mingled promiscuously with the citizens, and far from designating any particular friends for consultation, conversed for a short time with every one that came in his way. It was certainly a proud day for him, the honours of which he discharged with more than his usual care. At 2 o'clock, after passing 2 hours in this very agreeable way, the company separated. At 4 a dinner was given at McMunn and Conrad's,* where all the civil and military officers attended, and a number of citizens, which, including the former, amounted to about 50. Everything here was conducted with great propriety, and it was not unamusing to see Mr. Gallatin, Madison, and Dearborn on one side directly opposite to Mr. Meredith, Harrison, Steele on the other. . . . Thus you see that we are here at least all Republicans and all Federalists.

VIII

Upon the accession of John Adams to the Presidency, Steele was retained in office as Comptroller of the Treasury; and he continued to fill that office until the close of Adams's administration. In the year 1800 a division in the ranks of the Federalists seriously threatened the chances of Adams in the coming Presidential election. The Hamiltonian section of the party was out of sympathy with the President. Oliver Wolcott, although holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury, was deep in intrigues against Adams; and to McHenry, the Secretary of War, who was also in the cabal, he wrote (June 18, 1800): "The prospect is almost certain that the country will be freed from the greatest possible curse, a Presidential administration, which no party can trust, which is incapable of adhering to any system, in connection with which no character is safe." As soon as it became plain that Charles Cotesworth Pinckney could not be elected President, and believing it to be incompatible with honor and a suitable respect to his own character—as he put it!—to serve longer under Adams, Wolcott sent in his resignation on November 8, 1800, to take effect on the last day of December. Two days later (November 10), Adams accepted Wolcott's resignation.

* A boarding house near the Capitol.

In recognition of his great ability as a financier and of the skill, wisdom and discretion with which he had administered the office of Comptroller during two administrations, President Adams at once offered to Steele the post of Secretary of the Treasury. Steele was loth to accept the appointment so near the end of Adams's administration; and wrote to his close friend, John Haywood, of Raleigh, the State Treasurer, asking his advice as to the best course to pursue. In his reply, Haywood says: "The appointment now offered to you is completely gratifying and satisfactory to me; inasmuch as I consider it among the most distinguished and dignified in the gift of the Government. . . . As Secretary of the Treasury, you would be of higher grade, and more immediately of the President's constitutional advisers than at present. . . . I am clearly of opinion, you suffer yourself to be too far influenced by the principle of delicacy you state; as a proof of this, I am free to say, that I would as soon and as willingly accept from Mr. Adams, on the last day of his administration, any appointment he might think proper to confer on me, of which I believed myself worthy, and which the world or those who knew me considered me equal, as at any point of his administration. . . . In every view of the business, I am clear you ought to accept." Unable to overcome his delicacy of feeling in the matter, however, Steele declined the distinguished honor proffered him by President Adams; and on December 30, the President nominated Samuel Dexter as Secretary of the Treasury.

IX

Upon his accession to office, Jefferson appointed Albert Gallatin to the post of Secretary of the Treasury; and Steele, whose conduct of the office of Comptroller had been conspicuous for efficiency, he persuaded to remain. Steele remained in office against his own inclination; for he was unable for financial reasons to remove his entire family to Washington and for many months his health had been troubling him. Writing to Jefferson on July 11, 1801, Steele says: "I have for some time past wished to obtain leave of absence from the seat of Government to visit my friends in Carolina, and by a temporary relaxation from business, shake off, if possible, a complaint which gives me great uneasiness." One year later, in a letter to his wife (June 26, 1802), he says: "Since the middle of September, 1800, I have enjoyed the society and comforts of domestic life but nine weeks, and during all that time my anxieties have been increased by a delicate state of health, and the incessant cares of a laborious office."

At some time prior to this, Steele had communicated to his close friend, Nathaniel Macon, his intention of resigning. On June 2, 1802, Macon, who was really the leader in Congress of the opposite party, wrote to Steele: "I am extremely desirous that you should not retire. . . . I cannot refrain from saying, that I do not know any person, that would be so generally acceptable as yourself, nor can a stronger proof be given in favor of any public character, than that in times when party runs rather high, he should by the faithful & upright discharge of his official duty obtain the confidence of all candid men." Despite the urgency of Macon, of the opposite political party but his warm personal friend, Steele wrote as follows to Jefferson:

Sir, WASHINGTON, June 28, 1802.

About the 10th of next month, I wish to be favored with your permission to visit my family in Carolina. Hitherto a variety of considerations have restrained me from removing them to this place. Among others, a desire not to do anything which would render it inconvenient for me to conform to your views, whatever they might be, in relation to the disposition of my office. I thought it my duty also to postpone any communication of my sentiments to you on this delicate subject, until you should have had leisure to mature an opinion of my public conduct, and until Mr Gallatin, with all the assistance which I could give him in the mean time, should have become sufficiently acquainted with the forms, and principles of business in the Department to experience no inconvenience from a new appointment if that should be your intention, or if circumstances on my part should render a resignation necessary. After leaving the seat of Government with the permission which I now solicit, I am not certain that it will suit me to return: but if I should conclude to do so, my family will accompany me about the beginning of October, and in deliberating with them in the course of the summer on a step which must be attended with trouble, and the sacrifice of many domestic comforts, it will be extremely gratifying to me, to be certain that I understand your wishes. The politeness with which you have uniformly honored me since our first acquaintance, and a certain bias which is inseparable from the reflection, that we are citizens of the same Geographical section of the United States cannot but increase my reluctance to withdraw my services, if they are considered of any importance to your administration. Salary although necessary to me, in relation to my private circumstances is far from being my principal object in serving the public. In a country as free as this happily is, a man should have higher, and better views.—Mine are regulated by a desire, I trust an honest one, to be useful and in that way to acquire reputation, by deserving it. I am sensible, however that in times like the present, it is not possible for any man to continue in such an Office, with satisfaction to himself, or advantage to the public unless he can have reason to be assured that your confidence in his fitness is entire.

I have the honor to be, Sir
With sentiments of perfect respect
Your most obt servant
Jno Steele

Thomas Jefferson Esq
President of the United States.

In his very courteous reply, written two days later, the President says, among other things: "I am happy in the occasion it (your letter) presents of assuring you unequivocally that I have been entirely satisfied with your conduct in office, that I consider it for the public benefit that you should continue, & that I never have for one moment entertained a wish to the contrary. I will add, and with sincerity that I should with reluctance see any circumstance arise which should render your continuance in office inconsistent with your domestic interests or comfort, the possibility of which is intimated in your letter. Your deliberations with your family therefore on their removal hither may be safely bottomed on the sincerity of these dispositions on my part; and I shall be happy if they should have the effect of determining their & your resolutions to that measure." To this letter of the President, Steele made the following reply:

WASHINGTON, July 1st 1802.

Sir,

I am extremely gratified, and obliged by your favor of yesterday. It has determined me to postpone my journey to Carolina until the last week of this month which is the more agreeable to me, as my absence will then correspond with the general arrangements of the Executive.

If my private affairs can possibly be made to admit of it, a sense of gratitude for what I consider equivalent to a new appointment will induce me to return: but whether in or out of office, I pray you to be assured, that I shall always consider it a flattering distinction to be honored with your confidence, and that it will be my study and my pride to merit the favorable opinion which you have had the goodness to express to me.

I have the honor to be, Sir
With the highest consideration
Your most obedient servt
Jno Steele

Thomas Jefferson Esqre
President of the United States.

Upon his return to Salisbury on August 17, and after consultation with his family, all of whom like himself were in poor health, General Steele sent in his resignation to the President.

Sir, SALISBURY, September 30th 1802.

After leaving the seat of government on the 6th of Augt last with the permission which you did me the favor to grant to me I arrived at this place on the 17th where I found my family in their usual health; but I had been at home only a few days before nearly the whole of them (Mrs Steele of the number) were taken down with a fever which prevails very generally among the inhabitants of this part of the country. Scarcely a single family in our neighborhood can be said to have escaped. Mine continues to be so much indisposed that I am under the necessity of relinquishing (for the present) the intention of removing them to the seat of government, and consequently of requesting that you will be pleased to accept my resignation of the office of Comptr of the Treasury. With my resignation you will I hope also have the goodness to accept an assurance, that I am duly sensible of your polite treatment and that in future it cannot but be a source of pleasing and grateful reflection to me to have been invited by you to continue in the public service.

I have the honor to be, Sir
With perfect consideration
Your mot obt & hume servant
Jno Steele.

President of the U. States.

By this same post, Steele sent a letter to Nathaniel Macon, in which he says: "Since the last of Augt my family has been so much indisposed (Mrs. Steele of the number) that I have not in my power to make any arrangements in my private affairs preparatory to their removal to the seat of Government, and it is too irksome to live there as I have done for some time past without them. Thus circumstanced I have found myself under the necessity of relinquishing (for the present) the intention of returning. The mail which carries this carries also a letter to the President requesting him to accept my resignation." At the same time, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gallatin, he says: "In conducting, for six years past, the business of an office distinguished for the labor and responsibility which it imposes my first object has constantly been fidelity to the public, the second, a respectful deportment toward those with whom it was my duty to maintain official intercourse. It will afford me no small degree of gratification to understand that I have succeeded in these to your satisfaction."

The genuine regret which Macon felt over Steele's resignation is expressed in the following quotation from a letter to Steele, written from Buck Spring, Macon's plantation, on October 10, 1802: "Yours of the 30 ultimo has been received, and it is with real sorrow that I learn of your determination to resign. The reason which produces the resignation is surely a cogent one, but I think it probable that the season is approaching which will restore your family to health, and then you might with convenience have removed them to Washington. The office of Comptroller is surely among the most important in the U. S., especially as it relates to revenue; besides this, the settling accounts with foreigners, is one in which both the interest and honor of the nation are concerned; nor can I close this sentence without repeating my sincere regret at your resignation; who will be your successor I cannot even guess. No doubt many may be found willing enough to accept the office who know nothing of the duties; and I devoutly wish that a successor may be found, adequate in all respects to the office; I know from the best authority that the President was highly pleased with your conduct . . . "

The incident closes with Jefferson's letter to Steele (December 10, 1802), accepting his resignation, in which the President pays Steele this gracious tribute:

> Although in a former letter I expressed to you without disguise the satisfaction which your conduct in office since my coming into the administration had given me, yet I repeat it here with pleasure; and testify to you that setting just value on the able services you rendered the public in the discharge of your official duties, I should have seen your continuance in office with real pleasure & satisfaction and I pray you to be assured that in the state of retirement you have proposed, you have my prayers for your happiness and prosperity, and my esteem and high consideration.

Upon a number of occasions, General Steele was called upon by both the national and state governments, to exercise his diplomatic and executive talents as boundary commissioner. In 1797, Tennessee addressed a memorial and remonstrance to the United States upon the subject of the Indian title to lands within that State. Following a discussion in Congress, President Adams appointed as commissioners for concluding a treaty with the Indians John Steele, Alfred Moore, and George Walton. After preliminary negotiations were conducted in midsummer, 1798, the definitive treaty was concluded at Tellico on October 2, 1798, the Hon. George Walton and Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Butler acting as commissioners on behalf of the United States—Moore having returned to North Carolina and Steele having returned to Philadelphia to resume his duties as Comptroller of the Treasury.

Pursuant to a resolution passed by the State of North Carolina in 1801, the correspondence between the governors of North Carolina and South Carolina resulting therefrom, and the passage of certain acts of the general assembly of North Carolina in 1803 and 1804, Governor James Turner in October, 1805, appointed as commissioners on the North Carolina-South Carolina boundary line General John Steele, Colonel John Moore, and General James Wellborn. After a series of meetings between the commissioners of the two States, an extended conference was held at Columbia, S. C., in July, 1808, and articles of agreement were drawn up. Disagreement arising over the third article of the "Conventional Agreement," another set of commissioners was appointed in December, 1812, by Governor William Hawkins, to wit: John Steele, Montfort Stokes, and Robert Burton. Following a series of conferences with the South Carolina commissioners, a provisional article was entered into on September 4, 1813, which was ratified by the two States; and the line was accordingly run and marked. General Steele, who played the leading part in this difficult and delicate negotiation, gained universal approbation for the ability, tactfulness, and skill which he displayed throughout.

The most difficult of all the boundary disputes which

General Steele was concerned in settling was the famous controversy between Georgia and North Carolina over the "orphan strip," a tract of territory some twelve miles wide in Buncombe County, North Carolina, which Georgia in 1803 erected into the county of Walton. This territory lay south of the thirty-fifth degree of latitude, as then located; but grave doubts were raised as to the proper location of this line. North Carolina scientists having located this line far to the south of where it was supposed to run, North Carolina served notice upon Georgia in 1805 of her claim to the territory as part of Buncombe County. Following disturbances in the territory, Governor Jared Irwin of Georgia wrote Governor Nathaniel Alexander of North Carolina, suggesting the appointment of commissioners to settle the disputed boundary. On January 1, 1807, Governor Alexander appointed John Steele, John Moore, and James Wellborn as commissioners; and the Rev. Joseph Caldwell, President of the University of North Carolina, acted as scientist for the State in making the observations. When the thirty-fifth degree of latitude was run, it was found to be "twenty-two miles within old Buncombe"—much to the astonishment of the Georgians; and it was agreed by all that the actual line ran a little south of Cæsar's Head. The provisional agreement entered into by the commissioners on June 27, 1807, led to an extended controversy, which was finally productive of considerable bloodshed. North Carolina ratified the agreement; but Georgia refused to accept the findings of her own commissioners. Having once already appealed to Congress for settlement, Georgia again in 1807 appealed to Congress, but unsuccessfully—Congress paying no attention to the matter. For the next three years, Georgia persisted without success in her efforts to retain the territory; and finally North Carolina had to dispatch a company of State militia in December, 1810, to take possession of the county of Walton. Two pitched battles, and some small skirmishes, in which a number of lives were lost, were fought before the Georgians were finally ousted and the so-called county of Walton, Georgia, was finally merged into Buncombe County, North Carolina.

XI

When General Steele resigned his post as Comptroller of the Treasury, it was his intention to devote his leisure to the pleasures of polite literature, in particular the reading of French works in which he was proficient; to improvements in agriculture on a scientific and intensive basis; and to the calm enjoyments of domestic life in the bosom of his family, which had so long been denied him. "These," he observed to Macon, "will fill up my time to the exclusion of politicks, and with them I trust every passion which could disturb a virtuous and tranquil retirement." General Steele had quite extensive land holdings, including plantations and town lots. The two major properties were the beautiful plantation of eight hundred acres, "Lethe," on the Yadkin River below the Trading Ford and next to Albert Torrence's plantation; and "Lombardy," the estate near Salisbury where his family resided, including upwards of nine hundred acres. The dwelling house, which was erected in the first years of the last century on the latter property, is today in excellent preservation, although modernized in appearance.

The members of the Steele family, as their letters show, were on terms of delightful ease and informality in their intellectual intercourse with each other—a relationship somewhat unusual in an age marked by stilted language and formal deportment. Ann Nessfield was educated at Dr. Van Vleck's famous Moravian School at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania; and she spent a good deal of time with her father. Mrs. Steele seldom went on to Washington or Philadelphia; and General Steele's enforced absence from home for long periods of time was a source of continuing regret to all the family. Of the children of General and Mrs. Steele, three died in infancy—one born at Salisbury who died without a name in the summer of 1786; a son, William, who was born at Salisbury on March 18, 1793, and died August 18, 1794; and another son, born in Philadelphia on January 4, 1798, who died May 4 following without a name, the body being interred in the Pine Street Meeting House burying ground. Three daughters survived: Ann Nessfield, born January 27, 1784, who was married to General Jesse A. Pearson on February 13, 1804, and died October 4 of the same year; Elizabeth, born August 5, 1795, who was married on June 28, 1814, to Colonel Robert Macnamara, a prominent citizen of Salisbury, and died at Annsfield, near Salisbury, November 28, 1834; and Margaret Gillespie, born January 31, 1790, who was married to Dr. Stephen Lee Ferrand, a distinguished physician of Salisbury, on March 3, 1819, and died, as did her infant also, on May 13, 1824.

After his retirement from public life, General Steele assiduously devoted himself to that course of general reading which, as he expressed it to Macon, "keeps me employed with the hope of becoming a more intelligent and useful member of society." After the model of Washington, he carried out experiments in improved modes of agriculture; managed his estate with efficiency and economy; and in particular, devoted no little attention to the rearing and racing of blooded horses. He was a leading figure in the Salisbury Jockey Club; and the annual races run there were conducted according to regulations which he drew up. Probably the most famous of his racing horses were the blood-bay, "Statesburg," whose performances on the turf were pronounced by contemporary authorities to "have equalled if not surpassed those of any horse of his size on the Continent"; and "Midas," another famous racing horse of wonderful speed. These and others of his blooded horses ran in the big races of the day—at Salisbury, Cheraw, Camden, and Charleston.

While living the life of the gentleman farmer, who assiduously read the classics and the standard works of polite literature, and carried on an extensive correspondence with the leading men of the day, General Steele was by no means divorced from public activity during the last decade of his life. There were the onerous and exacting duties of boundary commissioner, which involved considerable correspondence and the writing of voluminous reports. Moreover, General Steele was frequently called upon to represent the Salisbury District in the House of Commons. He served in the Legislatures of 1806, 1811, 1812, and 1813, sometimes as Speaker of the House; and he was elected for another term on the day of his death, August 14, 1815.

John Steele is said to have been one of the most versatile men North Carolina has ever produced. Grave in temperament and of a serious bent of mind, he always conducted himself with great dignity; and he was seldom seen to smile. The portrait of him, made by the famous miniaturist, James Peale, in 1797, portrays a man both handsome and bland. At the height of his career he was credited with being the most popular man in North Carolina.

The inscription upon his tombstone and contemporary obituaries speak best of the man and the place he filled in the life of the time. The marble shaft in the private burial ground at "Lombardy," now known as "Steeleworth," bears the following inscription:

The following obituary (The Star of Raleigh, August 25, 1815) requires no commentary:

"A great man has fallen in Israel."

Died, a few days ago, at his seat near Salisbury, General John Steele, long known as a distinguished statesman.—General Steele was a member of Congress soon after the adoption of the Constitution, contributed his full share to the establishment of the Government, and to give effect to those measures and policies which were pursued under the first administrations. He was afterwards for several years Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, and has since occasionally been a Member of the Legislature of his native State. . . . The knowledge of General Steele was various and profound, and his reasoning powers great. Among the political sages of our country he has left a chasm that will not easily be filled.

Life and Services of Colonel Jonas Johnston*

By Kemp Davis Battle

When I received Miss Hinton's cordial invitation to take part in these interesting proceedings, there were two things in her letter which I particularly noted: first, that my address was to be read; second, that it was to be, to use her tactful language, "not of great length." I shall give myself the benefit of the first provision and I shall try to give you the benefit of the second.

At the outset, I desire to acknowledge my obligations to Miss Hinton for furnishing me the material for this modest sketch. She has manifasted the enthusiastic and patient diligence of the historian in assembling every available record and reference bearing upon the life of her distinguished ancestor. Indeed, what I say today adds very little to a paper read by her before the North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the Revolution.

The biographical data in reference to Colonel Johnston's life is comparatively meager. He was born in Southampton County, Virginia, in 1740, the son of Jacob Johnston and Mary Waller Johnston. During his early youth, his parents removed to Edgecombe County, which was thenceforth his home. In estimating his talents and character, it is important to remember that Jonas Johnston was raised a plain, simple, hard-working farmer, with no education save that which strong minds are able to extract from the stream of practical experience. In 1768, at the home of Aquilla Suggs, near Tarboro, he was married to Esther Maun or Maund, of Norfolk County, Virginia, a woman who, in good sense, in resourcefulness, and in strength of character, seems to have been quite his equal. Both parties had in ample measure that self-reliance, that ability to rise to any emergency, that capacity to maintain one's footing no matter how fast may flow the stream of difficulty or adversity, in a word, that "spiritual toughness" which makes the lives of our pioneering forefathers so entrancingly picturesque.

Emergencies seem always to produce or to discover men of unusual strength to deal with them, and so it was with Jonas Johnston. To us who live in an age when electric communication has girdled the globe; when our morning newspaper chronicles every significant happening from one end of the earth to the other; when the jungles of Africa, the steppes of Russia, the plains of Tibet and the pampas of Argentine alike seem almost around the corner; when man travels with equal ease under the sea, through the air, and upon the crust of the earth; when the telephone and the telegraph are beginning to seem archaic, as wizard inventors weave us fantastic tales of individual automatic wireless telephones carried like a bunch of keys in the pocket; when the automobile, having vanquished the horse, begins to tremble at the advent of the aeroplane; to us, I say, it is almost impossible to comprehend the material and physical difficulties with which our forefathers contended at the time of the Revolution. Communication was by coach, by carriage, by wagon, by horseback or by foot. The roads, measured by present standards, were impassable. Public schools were unknown, education was the boon of the favored few. When we bear these conditions in mind, it should excite equally our humility and our amazement to contemplate the intelligence, the comprehension, the wisdom, the foresight and the idealism of that noble band of patriots who builded our Republic. In that great task, Jonas Johnston, unlettered plowboy, but endowed by nature with strength of character and of mind buttressed with courage and determination, played a man's full part.

Espousing from the beginning the cause of liberty, Johnston, who was then in his thirties, early became a leader. He was conspicuous at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, where he manifested the coolness and intrepidity under danger which characterized his brief but gallant military career. In those early days, the struggle which finally terminated in our independence, bore largely the earmarks of a civil dispute. The Tories were numerous, influential, and bold. A preliminary period of strife was necessary before the colonies were able to organize a comparatively united front against the English arms. Johnston did yeoman's service in this work. On one occasion he organized at Tarboro a band of volunteers which he led down to the Cape Fear River where a Tory uprising was causing grave anxiety. The expedition was entirely successful and it was probably in recognition of his services that he was given a commission as First Major by the Provincial Congress at Halifax. This was on April 22, 1776. From that time on he was constantly engaged in the fight for freedom. It is true that he missed a good deal of time from the military forces while attending various sessions of the Provincial Congress, of which more hereafter. His necessary absence from his regiment and his early death doubtless prevented him from attaining the reputation as a military leader which would otherwise have been his. Nevertheless, his record in that respect is one of which his descendants may well be proud.

But before actual fighting could begin, there was much preliminary work to be done. Johnston was not found wanting. When the Council of State met at New Bern, September 2, 1777, the Governor laid before the board the resolve of Congress to divide the States into districts with one person in each district to recruit men to fill the regiments raised in such State. For Edgecombe, Jonas Johnston was appointed. (State Records 22, page 926.) The Provincial Congress at Halifax, April 19, 1776, appointed Henry Horn and Jonas Johnston "to receive, procure, and purchase firearms for the use of the troops." (State Records 10, page 525.) When the Council of State met at Kinston, December, 1778, Col. Jonas Johnston laid before the board an account for sundries furnished the militia marching from Edgecombe. The Governor advised the board to grant a warrant on Treasury in favor of Col. Johnston for 400 pounds. (State Records 22, page 942.) A letter written by Major Johnston (now a Lieutenant-Colonel) to Governor Caswell, under date of November 24, 1778, and found in State Records 13, page 298, is so illuminating as to the difficulties which our hero was encountering and so eloquent of his resourcefulness and determination, that I venture to quote it in full:

May it please your Excellency: I have herewith sent you the Commissions of Capt. Davis and Ensign Gay, resigned, the former through infirmity, the latter through cowardice and as no Ensign offers to supply the place of Gay our detachment is without any Captain. Lee who now heads the Company, is a volunteer, who accepted the office in the room of Davis resigned, and as I have no blank commissions he is without. One Absolum Barnes, our Lieutenant, has a commission. I am sorry to inform your Excellency of so many resignations at present, but it is out of my power to help it. I have furnished Capt. Lee with 934 lbs. of beef, 2 barrels of meal, and 8 pots and 8 axes, and am happy to inform your Excellency that the men are mostly in good health, and now on duty; are in high spirits and resolved to encounter every difficulty. I can only add, I am sorry that more of our old Captains would not go with them, as I think so large a detachment deserves a good Captain and so no more at present but Sir I still remain,

Your Excellency's mo. huml. servt.,

JONAS JOHNSTON.

N. B.—The other detachment is now drafting, and will march as soon as possible. J. J.

One can form from the foregoing disconnected incidents some slight estimate of the patriotic and valuable work performed by Colonel Johnston in the immensely important task of raising and equipping and drilling the troops which were to test their mettle with the British. Indeed, a little reflection leads to the conclusion that this harassing and sometimes disheartening work was more far-reaching in its results than gallantry on the field of battle. At length, however, Colonel Johnston took command of his regiment, and with Colonel Caswell marched to South Carolina where help was greatly needed. The best record of his activities there is contained in a series of letters written by him to the Governors of North and South Carolina. These letters bear unmistakable evidence of the man's statesmanlike judgment and indomitable will-power. His career ended with the Battle of Stono Ferry, fought June 20, 1779. In this engagement he greatly distinguished himself by his personal courage and the skill with which he handled his men. Tradition has it that the title of General was conferred on him by the War Department for bravery in the Battle of Stono Ferry, but this cannot be verified. The wound which he received that day deprived the country of a leader of very great promise. Suffering both from wounds and sickness, he was granted a furlough and started on his journey home. His wife set out from Edgecombe to meet him, traveling in a gig, and attended only by a colored servant. He reached the home of a Mr. Amis on Drowning Creek, S. C., where on July 29, 1779, he died. The sword which he wore at Stono Ferry and which had been captured from the Hessians, was inherited by Governor Elias Carr and is now in the Arts and Industry Building, Smithsonian Institution, in Washington.

At the present time, Colonel Johnston is usually thought of as a soldier, but it was probably in civil life that he achieved greater eminence and made a greater contribution to his country. And here I must again call to your attention the fact that he never received a formal education and that his success was purely the result of his natural strength of mind and integrity of character. I quote from an article in the North Carolina University Magazine of April, 1861, written by Jeremiah Battle, M.D.: "Although he was almost destitute of education, he was a considerable orator; and whenever he rose to speak in those public assemblies the greatest attention was paid to his opinions, as they ever carried the strongest marks of good sense. His language was bold and nervous; well adapted to incite the people to patriotic exertion. He was modest, yet competent, prompt and decisive." It is to be understood that the word "education" is used in the sense of "schooling." Using the word in its widest sense, he did have an education. Colonel Johnston was a member of the Provincial Congress from 1776 to 1779, inclusive, and took a promient part in its affairs. It may be interesting to name some of the committees on which he served, as follows: Committee on Enquiry; on Consideration of Messages from the President of the Congress; Claims and Accounts; to Establish Courts of Justice of the Peace; on the Disposition of the Public Salt; on the Erection of a State House, Land Office, and Treasurer's Office; to Examine the Accounts of the Paymaster-General; to Devise Means for Paying for a Quantity of Cannon brought in by the Ship Holy Jesus; and the Committee to Raise Men to March to the Southward." He must have taken the last appointment very much to heart, as he ended by marching southward himself—to his death.

Among the bills which he introduced were the following: "A bill to regulate the fees of Justices of the Peace and Clerks of the Superior Court;" "A bill to construct a bridge over Contentnea Creek;" "A bill to dock the entails of land;" and "A bill for emitting 850,000 pounds in bills of credit for discharging debts incurred by the State in raising men to reinforce the battalions belonging to this State in the Continental Army; and calling in all former emissions and for other purposes." To me there is something very impressive in the picture of this unlettered Edgecombe farmer introducing the financial measures for meeting the State's needs in those anxious and trying times. We find him voting in the affirmative on the bill to confiscate the property of all those inimical to the United States. He voted "yea" on "A bill for levying a tax for the year 1779, that the bill be amended by levying a tax of three pence on each pound of taxable property instead of two pence." It sometimes takes as high a quality of courage to face popular disfavor by voting to increase taxes as it does to face a cannon volley. These fragmentary references to Colonel Johnston's legislative career do not purport to do more than cast a flickering spotlight on his manifold activities. I think they do, however, suffice to present to us a man of progressive ideals, respected among his fellows for his practical knowledge and experience, successfully active in a variety of fields, a substantial, forceful, forward looking patriot.

As we are largely indebted for this occasion to Colonel Johnston's descendants, it seems permissible to give some account of his family and connections. His wife, Esther Maun, must have been a woman of great strength of character. When the war came, Colonel Johnston had just started to erect a residence. The frame dwelling had been completed on the outside, and the laths within were ready for the plastering. Work was necessarily suspended and was not resumed during the owner's lifetime. Colonel Johnston was less than 40 years of age at his death and had given too much of his time and attention to public matters to have accumulated any considerable property. Mrs. Johnston was left with a small farm and five small children. Devoting all her energy and resources to the education of her children, she abandoned all plans for completing her home and did not resume the work until each child had received what was for that age a good education. By industry and economy she met with entire success the responsibilities which her husband's death imposed upon her and won the respect and admiration of all her neighbors. For the last 15 years of her life she was paralyzed but reached the ripe age of 89 years. She is buried on the Johnston plantation, now belonging to the Cobbs of Vinedale. The grave is marked by a tombstone erected by Jonas Johnston Carr, the railing by the Ruffins. I quote the words of one who knew her: "Her own dissolution she looked to without fear, though helpless in body she was strong in faith, and her lamp burned clearer as her sun of life shed its last rays on the fleeting pleasures of this world."

The only children of Jonas Johnston and his good wife which survived and left descendants were four daughters:

Elizabeth, who married first, John Bell, second John Andrews; Celia, who married first, Jesse Hines, and second Elias Carr; Prudence, who married Peter Hines; and Mary, who married Samuel Ruffin. Among their descendants are the names of the following families: Bell, Hines, Carr, Prince, Blount, Vines, Cobb, Ruffin, Andrews, Barnes, Horne and Hinton.

Among those who have attained distinction of various kinds are the following: Hon. Richard Hines, Congressman from North Carolina; Jonas Johnston Carr, of "Bracebridge Hall," southern planter; Dr. Peter Evans Hines, Surgeon Provisional Army Confederate States; Col. A. B. Andrews, railroad builder; Governor Elias Carr; Mrs. David Hinton, a representative of the best Southern Womanhood; Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, personally known to all present; R. A. Blount, son of R. E. Blount of Paris, a Lieutenant of the Foreign Legion, and a wearer of the Croix de Guerre with Palms for gallantry at Verdun; and William Kearny Carr of Washington, D. C., who died some two or three years ago. W. K. Carr was a scientist and student of the very highest rank. In my opinion he possessed probably the most comprehensive and powerful intellect which Edgecombe County has ever produced.

And so, ladies and gentlemen, I hold it altogether fitting that we should meet to pay a tribute of respect to this sturdy patriot. By his heavy labors in raising and equipping troops to fight in the cause of freedom, by his wise statesmanship in our legislative assemblies, by the sacrifice of his life in defense of our common country, and by his useful and distinguished posterity, he has put the State of North Carolina as well as the county of Edgecombe very much in his debt. It is good that this tablet will adorn our courthouse as his memory adorns our history.

Mr. Chairman of the Board of County Commissioners, it is my high pleasure and distinguished privilege, on behalf of the State Historical Commission, the County Commissioners, and Colonel Johnston's descendants to present through you to the county of Edgecombe this memorial to her worthy son. May future generations of her citizens by it be inspired to emulate his example and to cherish his memory.

NOTES BY THE EDITOR

Family tradition claims that Colonel Johnston's father came to America from the north of England. The family is not of Scottish origin.

Governor Henry Toole Clark was well versed in the genealogy of the prominent families of his county (Edgecombe). It was he who compiled and arranged the "Johnston Family Tree," some copies of which are today carefully preserved by the descendants of the hero of Stono Ferry.

Colonel Jonas Johnston was an Episcopalian. His Prayer Book is in the possession of descendants in North Carolina.

At the General Assembly held at New Bern November, 1777, "Mr. Jonas Johnston presented a petition from a number of inhabitants of Edgecombe County, praying to have the same divided."

In 1776 the Convention established "An ordinance for appointing Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs and Constables for the several counties in this State, for erecting County Courts for the purposes of holding sessions of the Peace, and putting into execution the laws relative to Orphans, Guardians, and highways until provisions shall be made by the General Assembly for the same." Jonas Johnston was appointed a "Justice for keeping the Peace in Edgecombe. The other J. P.'s appointed for Edgecombe at the same time were: Aquila Sugg, Edward Moore, Samuel Ruffin, Duncan Lamon, Elisha Battle, William Haywood, Sherwood Haywood, Henry Erwin, Joseph Williamson, John Thomas, Matthew Drake, Noah Sugg, Robert Bignall, Nathan Bodie, Exum Lewis, William Hall, Isaac Sessums, Jacob Dickinson, Arthur Arrington, and Joseph Pender, Esquires."

In the spring of 1778 Colonel Johnston was appointed entry taker for Edgecombe, which office he accepted. This prevented his holding his seat in the General Assembly, according to the twenty-fifth section of the Constitution, which did not allow "a receiver of public monies" "a seat in the General Assembly." On April 28, 1778, a motion was carried to fill the seat "vacated by his acceptance of the entry taker's office." However, on August 3, 1778, he appeared as a member of the General Assembly, so he must have resigned the county office.

"At a Council held at Kinston, the 9th September, 1779,

"Resolved, The Governor be advised to appoint Henry Hart, Esq., Colonel of the Company of Edgecombe, in the room of Colonel Johnston, deceased; Isaac Sessums, Lieutenant-Colonel; Henry Horne, First Major, and Amos Johnston, Second Major."

A DECLAMATION

My worthy Auditors: Sensible of my inability to appear as a publick speaker before you here today with approbation, I would request this of you before whom I have the honour of declaiming from this stage, that if the subject which I shall treat of, be not discussed to as great perfection as it might be (which I confess is the case) you will judge of my performance with mildness and candor.

I have often wondered that learning is not thought a proper ingredient in the education of women. For seeing they have the same improveable and docile minds as the male part of the species, why should they not be cultivated by the same method? Why should reason be left to itself in one of the sexes and be cultivated with so much care and diligence in the other? Why should man's reasonable companion be left to wander in the dark Vale of Ignorance whilst he is permitted to glide along in the flowery Paths of Learning?

There are several reasons why learning seems equally adapted to the female world as to the male. As in the first place, because they have more spare time on their hands and lead a more sedentary life. Their employments are for the most part of a domestic nature and not like those of the other sex, which are often inconsistent with study and contemplation, as being harrassing and disturbing to the mind.

A second reason why women should apply themselves to the study of useful knowledge as well as men is because they have that natural gift of speech, that velocity of the little machine called the tongue, in much greater perfection. And seeing they have so excellent a talent, such a Copia Verborum, or plenty of words, it is a pity they should not put it to some commendable use.

If the female tongue will be in motion, why should it not be set to go right? Could they discourse on philosophical subjects, or on the revolutions of antiquity, it might possibly divert them from publishing the faults, disclosing the secrets, and blemishing the character of their neighbors: could they talk of the different aspects and conjunctions of the planets, they need not be at the pains to comment upon oglings and clandestine marriages. In short, were they furnished with matters of fact out of the arts and sciences, it would now and then be of great ease to their invention.

There is another reason why those especially who are women of quality should apply themselves to letters, namely, because their husbands are sometimes strangers to them; and it seems to me to be a matter truly lamentable that there should be no knowledge in a family either by the father or mother.

To what is it owing, unless to the illiterateness or neglect of parents, that we see so many impudent, ill-bred children, who not being restrained in their childhood from, but rather indulged in, their youthful fancies; arriving at manhood and their licentiousness increasing proportionably, they become rude and insolent to their superiors, subject neither to ministers or magistrates, not even to parents themselves, but, as the celebrated Mr. Young says:

"Ripe from the tutor, proud of liberty,
He leaps enclosure, bounds into the world;
The world is taken, after ten years toil,
Like ancient Troy; and all its joys his own.

"Alas, the world's a tutor more severe,
Its lessons hard, and ill deserved his pains;
Unteaching all his virtues Nature taught,
Or Books (fair Nature's advocates) inspired."

From whence proceeds this misfortune, that so many flourishing branches, who might have become useful members of society, an honor to their parents, and an ornament to their country, should shoot up as it were into so many cumbersome trees, spending their life in inactivity and sloth, lying by among the number and refuse of mankind, unless from a bad or rather no education?

Another reason why women ought to be educated proceeds from the many advantages which are consequences therefrom; for the tutelage of children being almost solely in the hands of mothers, they have the most excellent opportunity of infusing the noblest principles into them, of rooting out the very seeds of vice, and by turning off the stream at the fountain into proper channels, before that the water may have worn deep the natural channel with its swift running current; they might by this means convey the stream between rocks and precipices into foreign lands, and distant nations receive the benefit of the increasing rivulet, and reap the advantages of it a thousand years hence.

If we look into the histories of famous women, we find many eminent philosophers of this sex; nay, we find that several females have distinguished themselves in those branches of philosophy which seem almost repugnant to their natures.

There have been famous Pythagoreans, notwithstanding most of that philosophy consisted in keeping a secret, and that the disciple was to hold her tongue five years together. I need not mention Portia, who was a stoic in petticoats: now Hipparthia, the famous she-cynick.

Learning and knowledge are perfections in us, not as we are men, but as we are reasonable creatures, in which order of beings the female world is upon the same level with the male. We ought to consider in this particular, not what is the sex, but what is the species to which they belong. At least, I believe every one will allow me, that a female philosopher is not so absurd a character and so opposite to the sex, as a female gamester; and that it is more irrational for a woman to pass away her time at cards or dice, I might likewise have said in immoderate dressing, than in laying up stores of useful learning. This therefore is another reason why I would recommend the study of knowledge to the female world, that they may not be at a loss how to employ those vacant hours that lie heavy on their hands.

I might also add this motive to my fair auditors, that several of their sex, who have improved their minds by books and literature, have raised themselves to the highest posts of honor and fortune, but I shall conclude this head with the history of Athenais, which is a very signal example to my present purpose.

The Emporor Theodosius being about the age of one and twenty and designing to take a wife, desired his sister, Pulcheria, and his friend, Paulinus, to search his whole empire for a woman of the most exquisite beauty and highest accomplishments. In the midst of this search, Athenais, a Grecian virgin, accidentally offered herself.

Her father, who was an eminent philosopher at Athens, and had bred her up in all the learning of that renowned place, at his death left her a very small portion, in which also she suffered great hardships from the injustice of her two brothers.

This forced her upon a journey to Constantinople, where she had a relation who represented her case to Pulcheria in order to obtain some redress from the Emperor. By this means that religious princess became acquainted with Athenais, whom she found the most beautiful woman of her age and educated under a long course of philosophy in the strictest virtue and most innocence. Pulcheria was charmed with her conversation and immediately reported to the Emperor, her brother, Theodosius. The character she gave made such an impression on him that he desired his sister to bring her away immediately to the lodging of his friend, Paulinus, where he found her beauty and her conversation beyond the highest idea he had framed of them. His friend, Paulinus, converted her to Christianity and gave her the name of Eudosia; after which the Emperor publickly espoused her, and enjoyed all the happiness in his marriage which he had promised himself from such a virtuous and learned bride. She not only forgave the injuries which her two brothers had done her, but raised them to great honours; and by several works of learning, as well as by an exemplary life, made herself so dear to the whole empire that she had many statues erected to her memory and is celebrated of the church as the Ornament of her Sex.

Calvin Jones*

Physician, Soldier and Freemason

By Marshall DeLancey Haywood

Major-General Calvin Jones, an officer of North Carolina troops throughout the Second War with Great Britain, a physician and scientist of marked ability, and Grand Master of the Masonic Grand Lodge of North Carolina, was born at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, on the 2d day of April, 1775. His birthplace was in the Berkshire Hills. His father was Ebenezer Jones, a soldier in the Army of the Revolution, and the maiden name of his mother was Susannah Blackmore. The family's earliest progenitor in America was Thomas Ap Jones, a Welchman, who settled at Weymouth, Massachusetts, in 1651. From him, Ebenezer Jones was fourth in descent.

EARLY LIFE AND EDUCATION

Of the early life of Calvin Jones we know little. We get a slight glimpse of the surroundings of his infancy in a letter to him from his father's sister, Mrs. Mary Collins, who says: "I came to your father's house to stay with your mother while your father and Uncle Joseph went to fight for their dear country. You were then 16 months old." A letter from his father declares: "Your mother and I made slaves of ourselves that our children might have education." We are unable to ascertain in what institutions Calvin Jones received his education, but that he was possessed of a varied store of knowledge in state-craft, medicine, surgery, science, history, botany, and polite literature, there is ample proof. The study of medicine he began in boyhood, and he made such wonderful progress in that science that he was able to stand an examination on the subject at the early age of seventeen. A certificate, or medical license, now owned by his descendants, reads as follows:

These may certify that Calvin Jones, on ye 19th of June, 1792, offered himself as a candidate for examination in the Healing Art before the United Medical Society. He was likewise examined and approved of by the said Society as being well skilled in the Theory of the Physical Art, and by them is recommended to the Publick, as per Order of James Batten, president.

DOCT. DAVID DOTY, Secretary.

We have never been able to learn where this United Medical Society was located. Before leaving New England, Dr. Jones practiced his profession with marked success, as we learn from general letters of recommendation and introduction from physicians with whom he had been associated before removing to North Carolina.

LEGISLATIVE, MEDICAL, AND JOURNALISTIC CAREER

It was about the year 1795 that Dr. Jones settled in North Carolina, locating at Smithfield, in Johnston County. He soon gained the esteem and confidence of the general public in his new home, likewise attaining high rank among the most progressive and enlightened medical men of North Carolina.

In the course of time, Dr. Jones was called into public life by the voters of Johnston County, being twice elected a member of the North Carolina House of Commons, serving in the sessions of 1799 and 1802. He was an active, useful, and influential member of these bodies. His speech (November 20, 1802), against the proposed appropriation to establish a penitentiary, in the nature of a mild reformatory, was an argument of great force which was reported in short-hand by Joseph Gales, editor of the Raleigh Register, for the use of his paper (see issue of December 14th), and it was later republished in a small pamphlet. In this speech Dr. Jones said:

"The plan of lessening the frequency of crimes, by reforming instead of punishing criminals, has originated in principles that I revere; but sure I am the advocates of this measure are mistaken in the effects it is calculated to produce. * * * This extravagant project, in other States, has been more to accommodate vagabond wretches whom the jails of Europe have vomited upon our shores, than native citizens, and this strongly increases my objection to the measure. In New York, I am assured from authority on which I can rely, that two-thirds of the criminals in the State prison are freed negroes and foreigners. The prudent policy of this State [North Carolina], in refusing to liberate any of its slaves, will relieve us from one species of these pests of society, but we have no security against the other except in the rigor of our laws."

Concerning emigrants from Europe to America, Dr. Jones added: "There are many of them who were an honor to their own country, and who are now an ornament to this. I object only to these vagrant wretches who have no trade or profession but thieving and sedition; whose schools of education have been jails and armies, and who transport themselves here to avoid a transportation to Botany Bay, or to elude the pitiless noose of the hangman."

The session of 1802 ended the services of Dr. Jones as a member of the House of Commons from Johnston County, but, after his removal to Raleigh, he was honored with a seat in the same body as a representative from the county of Wake, as will be mentioned later on.

So far as is known, Dr. Jones was the first physician in North Carolina to discard the old treatment by inoculation as a preventive of small-pox, and to substitute therefor the new process of inoculation now known as vaccination. So up-to-date was Dr. Jones that he was extensively practicing this treatment before the experiments of its discoverer (Dr. Jenner) were completed in England. In 1800, while still living in Smithfield, Dr. Jones announced through the newspapers that he would begin a general practice of vaccination—or inoculation as it was still called—in the Spring of the following year. Later he decided to postpone such action until he could get the benefit of reports of more recent experiments elsewhere; and he published in the Raleigh Register, of April 14, 1801, a card in the course of which he said:

"The public have been taught to expect, from my advertisements of last year, that I shall, in the ensuing month, commence inoculation for the Smallpox; but I am prevented from doing this by the consideration of what is due from me to those who would have been my patients, whose ease and safety my own inclinations and the honor of my profession bind me to consult."

In this card, Dr. Jones further said of Dr. Jenner's discovery that eminent practitioners in England, Scotland, Austria, and France were using the treatment with success, while Dr. Mitchell, of New York, and Dr. Waterhouse, of New Hampshire, were among the American physicians of note who had been engaged in the same work.

In conjunction with a number of other well known physicians of the State, Dr. Jones was one of the organizers of the North Carolina Medical Society in the year 1799. On the 16th of December, in that year, these gentlemen met in Raleigh and perfected an organization. Dr. Jones was elected Corresponding Secretary or "Secretary of Correspondence," and served in that capacity during the life of the Society. This organization held meetings in Raleigh during the month of December in the years 1799, 1800, 1801, 1802, 1803, and 1804. The meeting in the year last named adjourned to reconvene at Chapel Hill, the seat of the University of North Carolina, on July 5, 1805. I can find no record of the Chapel Hill meeting, though it may have taken place; nor can I find any notice of subsequent meetings. In the issue of the North Carolina Booklet, of January, 1917, is a brief account which I wrote of this society. During its short-lived existence, many enlightening medical essays were read before it by its learned members, and much useful knowledge was thereby disseminated. Among other things, the society collected a botanical garden and natural history museum. Many years later, Dr. Jones, on the eve of his removal to Tennessee in 1832, turned over to the University of North Carolina a collection of this nature, which may have been the same. Alluding to this gift in his History of the University of North Carolina, Dr. Battle says:

"About this time a prominent Trustee, of Wake County, about to remove to Tennessee, General Calvin Jones, presented to the University his 'Museum of artificial and natural curiosities.' Probably some of these are somewhere among the University collections, but it is doubtful if they can be identified."

This collection contained a great variety and wide range of objects—from small botanical specimens to mastodon teeth and the bones of other prehistoric animals.

Dr. Jones was not only an enlightened and accomplished physician, but practiced surgery with notable success, many of his operations being of the most delicate nature—on the eye, ear, and other sensitive organs, which are now usually treated by specialists. He was also the author of a medical work entitled A Treatise on the Scarletina Anginosa, or what is Vulgarly Called the Scarlet Fever, or Canker-Rash, Replete with everything necessary to the Pathology and Practice, Deduced from Actual Experience and Observation, by Calvin Jones, Practitioner of Physic. This work was published at Catskill, New York, by the editors of the Catskill Packet, Mackay Croswell and Dr. Thomas O'Hara Croswell, in 1794.

Being a mutual friend of the parties concerned, Dr. Jones deeply deplored the political quarrel between the Honorable John Stanly and Ex-Governor Richard Dobbs Spaight at New Bern, in the early Fall of 1802. Together with other friends of those gentlemen, he earnestly sought to arrange their differences on a basis honorable to both. These commendable efforts were vain, however, and, when the code duello was resorted to, thinking his services as a surgeon might be of some avail, Dr. Jones was one of the party (not inconsiderable in number) which was on the ground when the hostile meeting took place, on September 5th. After several shots were exchanged without effect, Stanly's fire brought down his antagonist, who was carried from the field in a dying condition and expired shortly thereafter.

It was about 1803 that Dr. Jones left Smithfield and took up his residence in Raleigh. A few years later he was elected Mayor of the capital city—or "Intendent of Police," as the municipal chief magistrate was then called. Honors, too, came to him from the county of Wake, which he was elected to represent in the North Carolina House of Commons in 1807. His seat in that body was contested on the ground that (it was alleged) he did not own a one hundred acre freehold, as was then required of Commoners by the Constitution of the State; but the committee on privileges and elections, after hearing both sides, decided unanimously that "the allegations set forth in said petition are unfounded." Dr. Jones consequently kept his seat, and was a useful member of this Legislature, serving as chairman of the committee to preserve and perpetuate the paper currency of the State, as chairman of the committee to investigate the laws relative to slaves charged with capital offenses, and was a member of the committee on militia. He may have been a member of other committees in the same General Assembly. In connection with the contested election of Dr. Jones I may add that I do not know how much Wake County land he owned in 1807, but the court-house records show that he acquired extensive tracts in this county at a later date.

For a while Dr. Jones devoted some (though not all) of his time to journalism. In the Fall of 1808 he became associated with Thomas Henderson, Jr., in publishing and editing the Star, under the firm name Jones & Henderson, and later Thomas Henderson & Company. The files of the Star show the wide range of knowledge possessed by its editors in the various fields of science, art, history, and belles lettres, as well as in events (political and otherwise) then current. Henderson, like Dr. Jones, became an officer of North Carolina militia in the War of 1812-15. On January 1, 1815, Dr.

Jones disposed of his interest in the Star to Colonel Henderson, who thereupon conducted the business alone until January, 1822, when he sold his paper and printing outfit and went to Tennessee.

While Dr. Jones, otherwise known as General Jones, and Colonel Henderson were associated in the ownership and editorial management of the Star, the latter had a narrow escape from death by drowning, being saved by the heroism of Jacob Johnson, father of President Andrew Johnson. Captain William Peace, of Raleigh, an eye-witness of this occurrence, recounted it in writing half a century later to Ex-Governor Swain, who repeats it in an address on Jacob Johnson, delivered when a headstone was placed over his grave, June 4, 1867. Captain Peace said:

"At a large fishing party at Hunter's Mill Pond on Walnut Creek, near Raleigh, upwards of fifty years ago, the late Colonel Henderson proposed for amusement a little skim in the canoe on the pond. He, a young Scotch merchant named Callum, and myself, entered the canoe. Henderson was helmsman and knew that neither Callum nor myself could swim. He soon began to rock the canoe, so as at times to dip water, and just above the pier-head of the pond, bore so heavily on the end where he was sitting as to tilt and turn it over, throwing all three into the pond. Callum caught hold of me. I begged him to let go, as I could not swim. He did so, and seized Henderson, and both sank to the bottom in ten feet of water. I struggled and kept myself above water until they came to my assistance from the shore and carried me out. A cry was then made for Henderson and Callum. Jacob Johnson was standing on the pier-head. Without a moment's hesitation he leaped into the pond, dived in the direction of where he saw them sink, caught hold of Henderson and brought him up. In an instant a dozen swimmers were in the water from the shore to assist in bringing Henderson out, and Callum with him, who was clinging to the skirt of Henderson's coat underneath, and at the moment invisible."

Commenting upon the event just described in the account by Captain Peace, Governor Swain said:

"Fortunately for the sufferers, the late General Calvin Jones, Henderson's partner, was on shore. He was an eminent and able physician and surgeon, and the most efficacious means for the relief of the apparently drowned men were promptly applied. Henderson was soon able to speak, but life was, to ordinary observers, extinct in Callum, who was longer under the water. After an anxious interval of painful suspense, he exhibited signs of life, was restored, and lived to marry and rear a family. * * * Henderson suffered from the effects of the adventure during more than a year; and Johnson, though he survived for a longer period, passed away eventually, a martyr to humanity."

Like nearly all other editors of his day, Colonel Henderson operated a book and stationery business in connection with his newspaper office, and Dr. Jones also owned an interest in that establishment.

In the early part of the nineteenth century the American Colonization Society was organized by some of the foremost men of the United States for the purpose of thinning out the free negro population of the country by deporting to Liberia such members of the race as were willing to undertake the establishment of a republic of their own. The gradual emancipation of the slaves was also an event these gentlemen had in view. On June 12, 1819, the Reverend William Meade, of Virginia, later Bishop, came to Raleigh and formed a local branch organization. General Jones was much interested in the movement, and was elected a member of the Board of Managers of the branch then formed. Among the officers were: President, Governor John Branch; and vice presidents, Colonel William Polk, Chief Justice John Louis Taylor, Judge Leonard Henderson (later Chief Justice), and Archibald Henderson. This movement, as is well known, was eventually a failure, owing to the violent hostility it encountered from the more radical abolitionists of the North.

After successfully devoting himself to the medical profession for many years, and attaining a high reputation therein (as already shown), Dr. Jones finally abandoned active practice in order to devote himself to the management of his agricultural interests.

MILITARY CAREER.

Interest in military matters was a life-long characteristic of Dr. Jones. Almost immediately after his arrival in North Carolina, and before he removed to Raleigh, he was an officer of a regiment in Johnston County. Among the papers left by him is an autograph letter from President John Adams, dated Philadelphia, July 5, 1798, addressed to "The Officers of the Johnston Regiment of Militia in the State of North Caroina," and thanking them for their regiment's patriotic tender of services in the event of a war with France, then imminent, but which was happily averted. In the course of this letter the President bitterly declared: "Our commerce is plundered, our citizens treated with the vilest indignities, our Nation itself insulted in the persons of its ambassadors and supreme magistrates, and all this because we are believed to be a divided people."

In 1807 began the mutterings which a few years later culminated in the second War with Great Britain. On June 22d, the British man-of-war Leopard, in enforcing the alleged right of search through American ships for real or supposed deserters from the Royal Navy, met with resistance from the American frigate Chesapeake, which it attacked and captured, killing and wounding many of the crew, at a time when the two countries were supposed to be at peace. In consequence of this outrage, all America was aflame, and mass meetings were held in the more important North Carolina towns to protest against this insult to the Nation. As early as 1806 Congress had passed an act authorizing the President, in cases of emergency, to call out the State militia to the number of 100,000. Acting on this authority, President Jefferson ordered the militia of all the States to "take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold itself ready to march at a moment's warning." The quota required of North Carolina was 7,003, including artillery, cavalry, and infantry. The city of Raleigh and its vicinity were not backward at this juncture. Among the volunteer companies which offered their services was the Wake Troop of Cavalry, organized and commanded by Captain Calvin Jones. It held a meeting on July 4th and passed a patriotic and spirited set of resolutions, saying in part: "The spirit of the patriots who eternalized the day we are now assembled to celebrate, our principles, our feelings, and the conviction of duty, require that we offer to the President of the United States our services to protect the rights and avenge the wrongs of the Nation." This day in 1807, like all recurring anniversaries of American Independence, was celebrated with great pomp and ceremony by our ancestors assembled on the capitol grounds in Raleigh, "Captain Jones's Troop of Cavalry" and "Captain Peace's Company of Infantry" constituting the military feature. The Governor, State officers, the Judiciary, members of the bar, and a large concourse of citizens in general were in attendance. Among the toasts offered were the following:

"The memory of Washington: may the services which he rendered to his country be forever engraven on the hearts of Americans."

"The Government of the Union: may it always prove our sheet-anchor against domestic treason and foreign aggression."

"The State Governments: free, sovereign, and independent."

"The memory of the Seamen who lately fell a sacrifice to British outrage: may the atrocity of this act produce the adoption of such measures as shall secure us from future violence, and establish our maritime rights on a firm foundation."

"Good Neighborhood: may no religious or political difference of opinion interrupt the harmony of society; however men may vary in sentiment, may they all agree to be kindly disposed to each other as Brethren of the same great family."

Artillery was not lacking on this occasion, and a salute "in honor of the Union"—one round for each State—was fired, after which the company "partook of a plentiful and elegant dinner," a part of this being the above mentioned toasts. The old Raleigh Register, which gives us an account of these ceremonies, concludes the program by saying: "In the evening a ball was given to the ladies, which was kept up with equal spirit and decorum till near twelve, when Propriety, the best guardian of public amusements, moved an adjournment, which was immediately adopted."

War with Great Britain being averted in 1807, the services of the cavalry company commanded by Captain Jones were not needed then, but he continued his labors in training this troop and brought it up to so high a state of discipline that his talents were recognized by his being promoted to succeed Adjutant-General Edward Pasteur, when that gentleman resigned on June 7, 1808. That his capability was fully recognized is evidenced by the fact that he was reëlected by succeeding General Assemblies as long as he would hold the commission, serving under Governors Benjamin Williams, David Stone, Benjamin Smith, and William Hawkins. It was during the administration of the last named that the War of 1812-15 came on. Soon after the beginning of that conflict, Adjutant-General Jones, seeking more active service, sent in his resignation on January 23, 1813, and accepted a commission (dated December 14, 1812) as Major-General in command of the Seventh North Carolina Division of Militia, his jurisdiction extending over the forces of eight counties. Under him were Brigadier-General Jeremiah Slade, commanding the Fifth Brigade, being the forces of Martin, Edgecombe, Halifax, and Northampton counties; and Brigadier-General John H. Hawkins, commanding the Seventeenth Brigade, being the forces of Wake, Franklin, Warren, and Nash counties. In the Summer of 1813 the British forces made an extensive naval and military demonstration against the South Atlantic States, and it was thought that Virginia would be the first place attacked. Thereupon the Macedonian cry, Come over and help us, was sounded across the border by the Richmond Enquirer, which said: "If our brethren of North Carolina be exempted by the nature of their coast from maritime aggressions, will they not share with us the danger?" General Jones was not slow to heed this call, and began raising a corps of mounted volunteers with which to march to the assistance of our sister State. Announcing this purpose, the Raleigh Register, of July 9th, said editorially:

"We have pleasure in mentioning that General Calvin Jones, of this city, is about to raise a Corps of Mounted Volunteers, instantly to march to the assistance of the Virginians against the attacks of the British. * * * The citizens of the several counties are requested to meet at their Court Houses on Monday, the 19th instant, and such as are disposed to join this Patriotic Corps are to sign a writing to the effect. By the 25th it is expected the corps will be ready to march. The members are to equip themselves. A part are to be armed with rifles—the rest with muskets, the latter to be furnished by His Excellency the Governor."

In the Star, a Raleigh paper published on the same date, appears a stirring and patriotic address issued by General Jones, setting forth the details of his proposed expedition. In part he said:

"I propose to raise a corps of Mounted Volunteers for a three months' service, to march immediately to the shores of the Chesapeake. The design has the favor and approbation of the Commander-in-Chief. All who burn with the ardor of patriotism, or feel a passion for military fame, are now invited to rally around the standard of their country. * * *

"It is required that each volunteer be strong, healthy, and capable of enduring fatigue; that he be respectable for his character and manners—one whose sense of honor and love of fame will supply the absence or defect of rigid discipline; that he be temperate in the use of strong liquors, and able to incur the expenses of equipments, travelling and other contingencies. Each must be well mounted on a strong, active horse, of about five feet or upwards in height.

"The uniforms will be round jackets (double-breasted) and pantaloons of cotton homespun, dark blue and white, mixed; round black hats, with blue cockades; suwarrow boots* and spurs. Each will be armed with a broad-sword or sabre, or, for want thereof, a cut-and-thrust sword, slung over the shoulder by a white belt three inches wide, and a pair of pistols. As many as have rifles and are expert in their use, will be armed with them. The others will be furnished with muskets by the public.

"Each volunteer will be provided with a valise, blanket, overcoat or cloak, with such body garments to be worn under his uniform as he shall choose. Care will be taken that all the equipments are in good condition. Where it is proposed to take servants, there will be such an arrangement made among the volunteers of each county so that the corps will be incumbered with as few as possible.

"The officers will be selected by the Commander-in-Chief after the corps shall have been mustered at its rendezvous. The commandant will have the right of dismissing from the service any man who shall drink intoxicating liquors to excess, or be guilty of any other ungentlemanly conduct.

*A military boot taking its name from Field Marshal Suwarrow, of Russia. M. DeL. H.

"North Carolinians! an appeal is now made to your patriotism, your bravery, and your love of honorable fame. The character of your State depends on the success of this appeal. Arise, gallant spirits, and do justice to yourselves, and to the expectations of your country."

Editorially commenting upon this address by General Jones, the Star said: "From the spirit manifested in this place when the intention was first announced, we feel confident that, with proper exertions, a corps may be readily raised that will do credit to the State. Some of our first characters have already offered themselves." Upon being advised by General Jones of the enterprise he had in view, Governor Barbour, of Virginia, was not slow in conveying the thanks of his State, and wrote (July 5, 1813) saying:

"I should do great injustice to our feelings were I to withhold an expression of our grateful acknowledgments of your affectionate and magnanimous conduct. Nor do the emotions it inspires flow altogether from selfish considerations. We see, in the part you are acting, that spirit which bound us together as a band of brothers during the Revolution and carried us in triumph through that glorious conflict, and which, can it be kept alive, will give, under Providence, immortality to our confederated republic—the last hope of man."

Before General Jones could finish mustering in his corps of volunteers to aid Virginia there was need of his services nearer home, for the enemy unexpectedly landed on the coast of North Carolina at Ocracoke Inlet and the small hamlet of Portsmouth, at the inlet's mouth, also threatening the more important towns of Beaufort and New Bern. The Star, of Friday, July 23d, made announcement of this startling fact as follows:

"The news of the invasion reached this city on Saturday about eleven o'clock. On Sunday, General Calvin Jones, with his aides-de-camp, Junius Sneed and George Badger, and with Captain Clark's company of Raleigh Guards, consisting of fifty men, took the road for Newbern. On Monday morning, His Excellency Governor Hawkins, with Colonel Beverly Daniel, one of his aides, General Robert Williams and Major Thomas Henderson, with Captain Hunter's troop of Cavalry, moved off towards the same point. On Wednesday the requisition infantry from this county, amounting to one hundred men, accompanied by Colonel A. Rogers and Major Daniel L. Barringer, followed on. The Governor has ordered the greater part of the detachment of militia to the several sea-ports of this State; and, being almost destitute of munitions of war of every kind, he has ordered some of the United States arms now lying at Wilmington, to be sent to Newbern, and has caused to be purchased and sent thither all the powder and lead that could be procured in Raleigh, Fayetteville, Hillsborough and other places. He has for the present given the command of Newbern and on the sea-coast to Major-General Calvin Jones, but intends to conduct the general operations of the forces of this State in person, and to front the enemy in battle. We learn that great activity prevails among the militia in the lower parts of the State; they are flocking in from all quarters to the standard of their beloved country.

"Upon this occasion the ladies of Raleigh distinguished themselves for that love of valor and zeal of patriotism which characterizes their sex. They not only surrendered their husbands and sons to the dubious fate of war and encouraged the glorious enterprise by incentive persuasion, but were actively employed in fitting their brethren for an hasty march. In a few hours they made one hundred knapsacks."

While the more active citizen soldiery were hurrying to the sea-coast, a company of older men was organized in Raleigh for home defense. Colonel William Polk, who had valorously fought seven years for American independence in the Revolution, and had declined a Brigadier-General's commission tendered him by President Madison on March 25, 1812, now took command of this "City Corps" as Captain; and three other leading citizens, Judge Henry Seawell, William Boylan, and William Peace were Lieutenants.

General Jones arrived in New Bern on July 20th; and, acting upon the authority conferred on him by Governor Hawkins, assumed the command of all the State troops mobilized in that vicinity. The Governor himself reached New Bern the next day. Fears being felt for the safety of Beaufort, a large detachment was ordered to that town to garrison its fortifications, consisting of Fort Hampton, Fort Lawrence, Fort Gaston, and Fort Pigott.

The British force landed at Ocracoke and Portsmouth on July 11th. It was a most formidable one, and was commanded by no less a personage than Admiral Cockburn, who a year later was to play so conspicuous a part in the capture and destruction of our national capital. The fleet consisted of a seventy-four gun man-of-war, six frigates, two privateers, two schooners, and a considerable number of smaller vessels, including sixty or seventy barges and tenders. The entire force was estimated to be from one to three thousand seamen, marines, and infantry. This force captured the American barge Anaconda, of New York, the letter-of-marque schooner Atlas, of Philadelphia, and some smaller craft at Ocracoke, and pitched their tents on the beach. As soon as the fleet had been sighted, the collector of customs at Portsmouth, Thomas S. Singleton, packed his more important official records on board the revenue cutter Mercury, commanded by Captain David Wallace, and sent that vessel to give the alarm in New Bern, which (as was later learned) the British had intended to surprise and capture. Despite the superiority of their numbers, the enemy did not gain possession of Ocracoke and Portsmouth without resistance. Writing of the affair to Governor Hawkins in a letter dated July 24th, Collector Singleton said:

"The Anaconda and Atlas commenced firing very spiritedly, though it was of short duration, for the former had but fifteen men on board and the latter but thirty. They were therefore compelled to submit to overwhelming numbers, as there could not have been less than three thousand men at that time inside the bar and crossing it together. The men abandoned the brig [the Anaconda] and schooner [the Atlas] and betook themselves to their boats, most of whom escaped. The Captain of the Atlas remained in her and continued to fire at the enemy after all his men had forsaken him. Several of the barges proceeded in pursuit of the cutter [the Mercury], thinking (as they afterwards said) if they could have taken the cutter, they would have precluded the possibility of information reaching Newbern until they arrived there themselves. The cutter very narrowly escaped by crowding upon her every inch of canvas she had, and by cutting away her long boat. The Admiral did not hesitate to declare that it was his intention to have reached that place [New Bern] previous to the receiving any intelligence of his approach. After pursuing the cutter eight or ten miles through the sound, they gave out the chase and returned. Several hundred men were landed at Portsmouth and I presume as many on Ocracoke. Among those landed at Portsmouth there were about three hundred regulars of the 102d regiment under the command of Colonel Napier, and about four hundred marines and sailors. They had several small field pieces in their launches, but did not land them, finding no necessity for them."

Later on in the letter, just quoted, Mr. Singleton gives an account of numerous depredations and robberies committed by the invaders while on the North Carolina coast. They remained five days, and set sail on July 16th, without attempting to penetrate inland. Whether their departure was due to fear of the devious channels, which were so difficult to navigate, or whether they learned from the current North Carolina newspapers—of which they are known to have obtained a supply—what formidable measures were in preparation for their reception, will probably never be known. The fleet sailed southward, and it was consequently surmised that the Cape Fear section might be the next point of attack. Large numbers of troops were therefore hurried to that locality, but the British never landed again in North Carolina at that time. They did, however, send a flag of truce back to Ocracoke, announcing that they had formally proclaimed a blockade of the coast of the State.

Though not destined to have the opportunity of displaying their prowess in battle, no country ever had a more ready, vigilant and courageous class of citizen soldiery than those who hurried to the defense of North Carolina during the Summer of 1813. Many county detachments, more than a hundred miles from the prospective seat of war, marched down to the coast as soon as they could be gotten under arms, while the county seats and "muster-grounds" of more westerly sections of the State were soon teeming with patriotic volunteers, ready and eager to aid in repelling the invaders of their country.

In this campaign of 1813, Governor Hawkins remained on the sea-coast about a month, making personal inspection of the defenses from Ocracoke Inlet to New Inlet, and returned to Raleigh on the 16th of August. General Jones also returned when it appeared that there was no immediate likelihood of further trouble with the British in North Carolina. The Raleigh Register, of September 3d, said that a rumor had gained currency to the effect that a dispute had taken place between the Governor and General Jones, but the editor says: "We are authorized to state that the report is utterly destitute of any foundation in truth." That no coolness existed between these gentlemen is evidenced by the fact that, a few months later, when the General Assembly of North Carolina sent a complaint to the National Government of the neglect of the coast defenses of the State, Governor Hawkins designated General Jones for the duty of calling in person on President Madison and bringing this matter to his attention. The following item on that subject is from the Raleigh Register of December 3, 1813:

"General Calvin Jones has been appointed by His Excellency the Governor to present the Address of the General Assembly, lately agreed to, to the President of the United States, and yesterday set out on his journey."

So far as I am able to learn the British never sent a formidable force against North Carolina after the year 1813, though small marauding parties came by sea on more than one occasion. So free, indeed, was the State from local dangers that large numbers of her troops could be spared for service further northward, on the Canadian frontier; also nearer home, in Virginia, and against the hostile Creek Indians.

Norfolk and its vicinity, in Virginia, being again threatened by the British, President Madison, on September 6, 1814, made a requisition on Governor Hawkins for a large force to be detached from the militia of North Carolina and temporarily mustered into the service of the General Government. When it became known that this action would be taken, General Jones wrote the Governor, on July 31, 1814, asking for the command of that part of the militia which should be ordered to active service. This tender was not accepted. A little later, however, on September 26, 1814, the Governor commissioned him Quartermaster General of the Detached Militia of North Carolina. In the letter accompanying this commission, General Jones was informed that fifteen companies (containing in the aggregate fifteen hundred men) had been ordered to rendezvous at Gates Court House, under the command of Brigadier-General Jeremiah Slade, and to march thence to Norfolk. This commission was accepted by General Jones, who at once repaired to the encampment at Gates Court House, arriving there on the 30th of September. On October 1st, he wrote from the camp to Governor Hawkins, saying: "About one-third of the troops are under the shelter of houses, piazzas, &c., in the village, the remainder being encamped in the woods and fields adjacent. Today a regular camp will be marked out, and brush defences against dews and slight rains will be raised." Later on he says, in the same letter: "Though the privations and exposures of the men, suddenly translated from ease and plenty to the face of a hastily formed camp, are considerable and must be felt, yet they have assumed so much of the soldier as to scorn complaint. The men are cheerful and generally healthy." He also said the troops would be marched in small detachments and by different routes, on account of the scarcity of water, and to ensure the accommodation of barracks.

These troops were not armed until their arrival in Norfolk, where they were mustered into the service of the General Government. Writing from that city to Governor Hawkins, on October 8th, General Jones said:

"I have the honor to inform you that four companies of our Detached Militia arrived yesterday and encamped at Mooring's Rope Walk, the best encampment for health and convenience, I think, about Norfolk. A bridge, which had been broken down, is rebuilding and unites the peninsular, on which the Rope Walk is, immediately with the town. * * *

"The appearance of our Militia, on their entrance into Norfolk, was such as I think did them considerable credit. It was generally commended by the citizens and military here. My gratification would have been heightened could they have presented themselves armed.

"I accompanied Generals Porter and Taylor today to Forts Norfolk and Nelson, and to Craney Island, and rode round the lines of defense on the land side. The strength of this place is very formidable, and is daily increasing.

"I am at the point of setting out on my return home, and expect to arrive at Gates Court House tomorrow."

The early return of General Jones was due to the fact that his services as Quartermaster General were not needed after the North Carolina troops were mustered into the service of the General Government.

The North Carolina troops remained in and around Norfolk for many weeks, and were not entirely disbanded until after the return of peace. The treaty of peace was signed at Ghent on Christmas Eve, 1814, but news of that event did not reach Raleigh until February 18, 1815. It caused great rejoicing and was celebrated by religious services as well as public demonstrations. As is well known, the bloody battle of New Orleans was fought more than a fortnight after the treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, but long before news of it was received. The day on which the news of victory at New Orleans reached Raleigh was February 12, 1815.

So efficient had been the efforts of General Jones at the time of the British invasion of North Carolina in 1813, that a strong effort was made by his friends to secure for him a commission as Colonel in the regular army. Senator Stone claimed that he had received a promise of it from the Secretary of War; and, in a letter to Jones, complained bitterly of the Secretary's failure to keep his word.

His service with the North Carolina troops at Norfolk in the Fall of 1814 was the last active participation by General Jones in military affairs. Peace coming soon thereafter, he could now devote his talents to the more pleasing pursuits of a tranquil life.

SERVICES TO MASONRY

Possessed, as he was, of high educational attainments and fine sensibilities, Calvin Jones was not slow to appreciate the beautiful symbolical teachings of morality and charity embodied in the principles of Freemasonry, and he became an ardent devotee of that ancient fraternity.

The first Masonic organization which existed in Raleigh was Democratic Lodge, No. 21. A large portion of the membership of that Lodge having imbibed some of the evil principles of the French Revolution, then in progress, it gradually fell into disfavor and finally passed out of existence. The city of Raleigh, however, did not long remain without a Lodge. On December 15, 1800, Grand Master William Polk issued a charter to Hiram Lodge, No. 40, theretofore operating under a dispensation from Grand Master William R. Davie. Calvin Jones became a member of Hiram Lodge shortly after its establishment, and was elected Worshipful Master on the Feast of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 1805. He served in that capacity for one year. On December 11, 1809, he was elected Junior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina—or "The Grand Lodge of North Carolina and Tennessee," as it was called until 1813, when Tennessee became a separate Grand Lodge. General Jones had served as Junior Grand Warden only one year, when he was advanced to the station of Senior Grand Warden, holding the latter position from December 1, 1810, until December 8, 1817. On the latter date he became Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina, succeeding the Honorable John Louis Taylor, who soon thereafter was to become first Chief Justice of the newly created Supreme Court. General Jones was three times elected Grand Master, his services as such ending on December 16, 1820. Few finer tributes to Masonry can be found than the one contained in the official address of Grand Master Jones to the Grand Lodge in 1819. In part he said:

"The human family have enjoyed partial relief from the benign influence of our principles, without knowing the source of their blessings. The torch of science dissipates the darkness of one portion of the globe; in another, the fetters of slavery are broken; in one place, the infidel is converted; in another, the Christian is taught to feel the spirit of his religion; everywhere men begin to regard each other as members of the same family, and to place in the rank of duties the virtues of universal benevolence. Be it so. Under whatever denomination these happy effects are produced, it is our duty to rejoice that some seeds, scattered by our Order, have fallen on good ground. Were the principles of Masonry unveiled to those worthy men who direct their efforts to a single object, which they pursue with inadequate means, they would find how comprehensively beneficent are the principles of the Craft. To point out to man the duty of loving his brother, of assisting him in difficulty, of comforting him in afflictions, and to do all that these duties enjoin without regard to difference of nation, religion or politics; and further, to concentrate the lessons of experience as to the most effectual mode of performing these duties, and by the aid of an universal language to make our designs equally intelligible to the inhabitants of every clime—to do these things is to go beyond the powers of any society, however intelligent and estimable, whether Peace, Anti-privateering, or Colonization.

"Let us then, Brethren, pursue the noiseless tenor of our way, assisting every one engaged in the same cause, under whatever name or denomination known, according to the measure of his wants and our own ability, and be like the gentle but constant stream whose waters are concealed from the eye by the luxuriant plants upon its margin but whose effects are visible in the fertility it imparts to the various soils through which it meanders.

"Let us improve in our minds a lively impression of the true principles of our association, remembering that religion and politics are never to be subjects of discussion; that the religion of a Mason is love, veneration, and gratitude to the Supreme Architect of the Universe; that the doing good to all His creatures, especially to those of the 'household of faith,' is the most acceptable service and the first of duties; that the rights of conscience are inviolable, and that the Mussulman and the Christian, who love their brother and practice charity, are alike the friends of Masonry and of man."

In addition to the Masonic services in the official capacities heretofore enumerated, General Jones was a useful committee worker in the sessions of the Grand Lodge. Together with John A. Cameron, Moses Mordecai, William Boylan, and Alexander Lucas, he was appointed on a Grand Lodge committee which was authorized to coöperate with a similar committee from Hiram Lodge, No. 40, in erecting a Masonic Hall for the joint use of the two bodies on a lot which had been presented by a member of Hiram Lodge, Theophilus Hunter, the younger, and which lot stood on the northeast corner of Morgan and Dawson Streets. Half of the cost of building was paid by the Grand Lodge and half by Hiram Lodge. The corner stone was laid by Grand Master Robert Williams on the Feast of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1813. This building served its purpose until some years after the War Between the States, and venerable Masons are still living in Raleigh who received their degrees within its walls. The corner stone itself was exhumed by order of Hiram Lodge in March, 1880, and is now preserved in the ante-room of the Grand Lodge Hall in the Masonic Temple at Raleigh. Unfortunately it is a solid block, having had no compartment for the records which are usually contained in a corner stone. The old inscription on it reads:

The Grand Lodge of No. Carolina and Tennessee
Hiram Lodge, No. 40, City of Raleigh
June 24, A. L. 5813, A. D. 1813. R. Williams, G. M.

Grand Master Williams, who laid this corner stone, was at that time Adjutant-General of North Carolina, succeeding General Jones, as already mentioned. He came to Raleigh from Surry County, and should not be confused with Dr. Robert Williams, of Pitt County, also a zealous Mason, who had formerly been a Surgeon in the Army of the Revolution.

HOME AT WAKE FOREST AND EDUCATIONAL ACTIVITIES

Owning a large number of slaves who could not be profitably employed within the limits of a town, General Jones determined to remove from Raleigh and take up his abode in a rural neighborhood. North northwest of Raleigh, about sixteen miles, on the old stage road and mail route running northward via Oxford and Warrenton, North Carolina, and Petersburg, Virginia, was a country neighborhood, of healthy altitude and fertile soil, known as the Wake Forest section. In that pleasant locality, about the year 1820, General Jones took up his abode on a plantation of 615 acres, which he had purchased from Davis Battle. There, for about a decade, he kept open house to friends from far and near, in his "hospitable mansion," as Governor Swain describes it in his Tucker Hall address, referring to an occasion during his young manhood, in 1822, when he was nursed back to health within its walls, after a long and almost fatal attack of illness. Though not occupying its former location on the campus, the old home of General Jones is still standing and in a good state of preservation, being a substantial structure built at a time when massive timbers, well seasoned, were in use. After having served as a residence for several members of the faculty in bygone years, it is now the home of a club of students.

In the cause of public education, few more indefatigable workers than General Jones could be found in North Carolina. For thirty years, from 1802 until his removal to Tennessee in 1832, he was a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of North Carolina. That he was no figurehead the old records of that institution fully attest. In the Raleigh Academy he also took a deep interest, and was a trustee of that school for some years. Dr. Battle, in his History of the University of North Carolina, gives an amusing extract from a letter written by General Jones in 1811, expressing great dissatisfaction at an effort then being made to have some students, who had been expelled from the University, admitted into the Raleigh Academy. General Jones said he was greatly astonished that Governor Stone, one of the trustees of the academy, should wish them admitted, but he was not at all surprised that the Governor should have been seconded in his efforts by another trustee, Mr. Sherwood Haywood, a "good, polite, clever, worthy man, who never contradicted any one in his life." As Mr. Haywood was my grandfather, and as "to err is human," I am glad to know that the substance of his sinning was the fault ascribed to Sir Lucius O'Trigger—"too civil, by half."

For some years before Wake Forest College (first called Wake Forest Academy and later Wake Forest Institute) was established, there were several useful schools in the section of

Wake County where the college now stands. One of these was Forest Hill Academy, incorporated by Chapter 107 of the Laws of 1818; but, so far as we know, General Jones did not become connected with the governing body of that institution after his removal to the neighborhood where it was located. In January, 1823, Samuel Alston and Calvin Jones, members of the Board of Trustees, signed the announcement of the beginning of a session, on February 1st, of Wake Forest Academy, situated "fifteen miles north of Raleigh and within two miles of the Wake Forest Post Office, in one of the most pleasant, healthy, and reputable districts of our country." The teacher in charge of this school was James Pheelan. When General Jones first advertised his Wake Forest plantation for sale in 1827, he incidentally mentioned that there were three excellent schools (one classical) in the neighborhood. In the year following he gave notice of the opening of Wake Forest School, for both sexes, near his own residence. On June 26, 1831, he also announced through the papers that the Wake Forest Female School would be opened on the third Monday of the ensuing month of July, with Mrs. Phillips as principal and two "competent young ladies" as assistants. Mrs. Phillips was a Northern lady, strongly recommended by Bishop Griswold, of Connecticut, and other well-known men. This academy for girls was operated in General Jones's residence, where both teachers and pupils were housed. In concluding the last mentioned announcement, General Jones said: "The pure air and water, healthfulness, and good society of this place are too well known to require mention. That the location of this Seminary is in every respect proper may be inferred from the fact that Wake Forest has, for a number of years past, supported excellent and prosperous schools." In a sketch of General Jones in the "Benefactor's Number" of the Wake Forest Student, January, 1911 (this being a re-print of an earlier sketch), the late President Charles E. Taylor, of Wake Forest College, referring to this school for young ladies, says that an aged lady, who had been educated there, had stated to him that it was the custom of the Bishop of the Episcopal Church to make annual visitations there for the purpose of confirmation.

Several years before and for some time after General Jones sold his plantation at Wake Forest and removed therefrom, there was also located in that vicinity a school known as the Wake Forest Pleasant Grove Academy. Whether he ever had any connection with that institution does not appear.

Having made large investments in land on the vast domain in West Tennessee which the Government had acquired from its Indian owners, and which was known as the "Chickasaw Purchase," General Jones decided to remove with his wife and family to that locality in order to protect his interests there. As he had no intention of returning to North Carolina, he decided to dispose of his Wake Forest plantation. As money in that day had a larger purchasing power than now, and land was not costly, the price for which he held the plantation—with its great house, cabins, and other out-houses —was only $2,500. About this time the North Carolina Baptist State Convention instructed a committee of its members to purchase a site for an institution of learning which that denomination had determined to build, and this committee opened up negotiations with General Jones with a view to acquiring his plantation and equipment. Describing the transaction which followed, in an address at the semi-centennial of Wake Forest College, February 4, 1884, the Reverend James S. Purefoy said:

"Elder John Purefoy was one of the above committee, and a near neighbor of Dr. Calvin Jones, who owned the farm where the college now stands. Dr. Jones held his farm of 615 acres at $2,500; but, for the cause of education, he proposed to Elder Purefoy to give the Convention (through the committee) $500, and sell the farm for $2,000. Elder Purefoy recommended the farm to the committee, and it was purchased by the Convention for $2,000."

The committee which received the deed of transfer, August 28, 1832, from General Jones, for the use of the Baptist State Convention, consisted of John Purefoy (or Purify, as it was then written), William R. Hinton, Simon G. Jeffreys, Jr., and James J. Hall.

General Jones always showed a kindly interest in the welfare, both moral and physical, of his slaves. They were comfortably clad, well fed, and housed in such good quarters that their cabins were used as temporary dormitories for the students when Wake Forest Institute, the fore-runner of Wake Forest College, began operations. The first principal of Wake Forest Institute—also first president of Wake Forest College—was the Reverend Samuel Wait, who wrote the following interesting account of the early days spent on the plantation which had been purchased from General Jones:

"The former owner of the premises we now occupied had encountered much expense to provide for the comfort of his servants. I found seven good, substantial log cabins, made mostly of white oak, with hewn logs; good doors, floors, roofs, and, with one exception, windows. These were washed out cleanly and white-washed. Good, new furniture was provided for each house. And, although it was known that the cabins were built originally for servants, and occupied at first by them, I never heard of the least objection to them from any student. * * *

"The only place I could convene the students for morning and evening prayers, or lectures, was the building erected by Dr. Jones for a carriage house, 16 feet by 24 feet."

From this small beginning of Wake Forest Institute (at first a manual training as well as classical school) has grown Wake Forest College, with its modern equipment, scholarly faculty, and fine student body—one of the most notable educational achievements of the Baptist Church in America.

LIFE IN TENNESSEE, DOMESTIC AND RELIGIOUS RELATIONS AND CONCLUSION

It was about the year 1832 that General Jones removed with his family to Tennessee, though he had paid visits to that locality before. He owned about 30,000 acres of land in that State. His home plantation in Hardeman County, near the town of Bolivar, contained 2,500 acres. On the northern part of this tract he built a house of moderate dimensions. To this he gave the name of Wake Park, in memory of the happy years he had spent in Wake County, North Carolina. A little later, wishing to have more commodious quarters for his household, he removed two miles further south, on the same estate, to a point where he had erected a spacious mansion which he called Pontine, this name probably being derived from the Pontine Marshes, adjacent to the city of Rome. At Pontine the closing years of his life were spent, "retired from public employment, and enjoying, with ample wealth around him, the otium cum dignitate of the typpical Southern planter," to quote the language of his ardent admirer Judge Sneed. The site of Pontine is now owned by the State of Tennessee, being occupied by the Western Hospital for the Insane. It was purchased by the State from Colonel Paul Tudor Jones, younger son of the General. It is a remarkable circumstance, commented upon by President Taylor, of Wake Forest, in the sketch already quoted, that each of the two country estates occupied by General Jones in North Carolina and Tennessee is now occupied by a great institution—one for the education of youth at Wake Forest; and the other, near Bolivar, as a home and hospital for the mentally afflicted.

While a practicing physician in Raleigh, Dr. Jones had become engaged to be married to Ruina J. Williams, a young woman of rare loveliness, who was the daughter of Major William Williams, of "The Forks," in Franklin County, not far from the county of Warren. Before the union could be consummated, however, she fell a victim to consumption, passing away on the 20th of September, 1809, in the twenty-first year of her age. The beautiful faith and fortitude displayed in her last illness formed the subject of a small brochure entitled The Power and Excellence of Religion, written by the Reverend Joel Rivers, and published by the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Nearly ten years later, on April 15, 1819, when forty-four years of age, Dr. Jones married the widowed sister of Miss Williams. This was Mrs. Temperance Boddie Jones, née Williams, widow of Dr. Thomas C. Jones, of Warrenton. This lady, by her first marriage, was the mother of Thomas C. Jones, who was born in 1811 and died in Corinth, Mississippi, in 1893. The children of her marriage to General Calvin Jones were (in addition to several who died young) three in number as follows:

I. Montezuma Jones, born in 1822, at Wake Forest, who married Elizabeth Wood, and died near Bolivar in 1914, leaving issue.

II. Octavia Rowena Jones, born in 1826, at Wake Forest, who married Edwin Polk, of Bolivar, and died in 1917, leaving issue.

III. Paul Tudor Jones, born in 1828, at Wake Forest, who married (first) Jane M. Wood, and (second) Mary Kirkman; and died in Corinth, Mississippi, in 1904, leaving issue by both marriages.

General Calvin Jones had a younger brother, Atlas Jones, who was a graduate of the University of North Carolina in the class of 1804, was afterwards tutor of Ancient Languages at the same institution, and a Trustee from 1809 until 1825. He became a lawyer and practiced at Carthage, in Moore County, North Carolina, where he married Rebecca Street. He also lived for a while in Raleigh. He removed to Tennessee about the year 1825, and settled at Jackson, in that State. After his will was recorded in Tennessee, it was sent to Raleigh and again recorded, as he owned real estate in the latter city. In this will, his brother, Calvin Jones, and a nephew, Montezuma Jones, are named as executors. In his excellent History of the University of North Carolina, Dr. Battle is in error when he states that Atlas Jones was a son of Edmund Jones, one of the early benefactors of the University. General Calvin Jones also had a sister, Mrs. Higbee, who lived in Raleigh for a while, and kept house for him there before his marriage.

PONTINE

The Home of General Calvin Jones near Bolivar, Tennessee

One distinguished Tennessean, Judge Calvin Jones, of Somerville (a graduate of the University of North Carolina in the class of 1832), though he bore the same name as General Calvin Jones, was not related to him. He was, however, his namesake—both families removing to Tennessee from North Carolina, where they had been friends.

Though never an office-seeker, either in North Carolina or Tennessee, General Jones took a commendable interest in politics. In his younger days he was a Federalist. After that party passed out of existence, and the Whigs and Democrats became contestants for the mastery of the Government, he alligned himself with the Whigs. He was one of the vice-presidents of the National Whig Convention at Baltimore in 1844, which nominated Henry Clay for President.

After the adjournment of the convention last mentioned, General Jones made an extensive tour of Europe, being accompanied by his daughter. At that time he was nearing his three score years and ten, but still active and in good health.

In the final degree of Ancient Craft Masonry, the newly made Brother is exhorted so to live that in old age he "may enjoy the happy reflections consequent on a well-spent life, and die in the hope of a glorious immortality." The life of Past Grand Master Jones was a triumphont fulfilment of this precept. With the serene faith and humble hope of a Christian, amid the beautiful surroundings of his estate at Pontine, near Bolivar, he peacefully came to the end of his earthly pilgrimage on the 20th day of September, 1846. A notice of him, published in the Somerville Herald, and later copied in the Raleigh Register, of October 16th, was as follows:

"DIED.—At his residence near Bolivar, in Hardeman County, on the 20th instant, General Calvin Jones, in the 73rd year of his age. General Jones was a native of Connecticut, where he was educated. He removed in early life to Raleigh, North Carolina, where he established a high reputation for honor and probity, and was successful in winning the approbation of his fellow men in the pursuits of life. He emigrated to Hardeman County fourteen years since. In the region of the country in which he spent his ripe old age, he was regarded by all as a pious Christian, a gentleman in his deportment, full of the 'milk of human kindness' and a most valuable citizen. He sustained all the relations of life in the most unexceptionable manner; and, though he had reached to that period of life of man when its end must hourly be anticipated, such were the consecrated ties of friendship and love which bound him to the hearts of his family and the circle of his acquaintances that none were prepared to surrender so rich a gem to the remorseless grave—they mourn for him as for the loss of their hearts' chief jewel; and in their sorrow the whole community sympathize."

Though General Jones may have been educated in Connecticut, as stated in the notice just quoted, he was not a native of that State. As heretofore noted, he was born in Great Barrington, Massachussetts. His birthplace, however, is not many miles from the Connecticut boundary.

Many years after the death of General Jones, the State of Tennessee (as already mentioned) acquired by purchase his former plantation near Bolivar, and erected thereon the Western Hospital for the Insane. This institution was formally opened in July, 1890, when several addresses were delivered —one by the Honorable John Louis Taylor Sneed, formerly a Judge of the Tennessee Supreme Court.* Judge Sneed was a native North Carolinian, born in Raleigh. He was a son of Major Junius Sneed, who (as we have already seen) was one of the aides-de-camp of General Jones when the British landed in North Carolina in 1813. Judge Sneed was also maternally a grandson, as well as a namesake, of Chief Justice John Louis Taylor, of the North Carolina Supreme Court, who was the immediate predecessor of General Jones as Grand Master of the Masonic Grand Lodge of North Carolina. In the course of his remarks, Judge Sneed said:

"In conclusion, fellow-citizens of Hardeman, allow me to indulge in a reminiscence of the long ago, which you, at least, will appreciate. * * * Yonder stood a cottage which was the abiding place of hospitality, charity, and all the golden virtues which decorate the higher Christian life. It was the home of filial affection and parental tenderness, the common resort of the most elegant and cultured society, a place from which no poor man was ever turned comfortless away—the happy homestead of a happy household. The grand old master of that household has long since passed over the river, and his gentle and loving wife now sleeps by his side. In life both were loved and honored for all the graces that adorn human character and win human respect and admiration. In death, both are remembered by the rich and poor as examples of all that was noble, philosophic, gentle, and humane. * * *

"I was for a long period of my student life an inmate of that cottage and treated as one of the children of the family. A thousand years of life's changes and revolutions could never efface the impressions I then received of the moral and intellectual character of the grand old man. He had been a deep student of science, history and philosophy. His mind was a treasure house of knowledge, gathered from books, from foreign travel, and from his close fellowship with the great men and statesmen of the country. And yet, with a splendid capacity for the higher achievements of state-craft, he cared nothing for the tinsel of rank or the prestige of office, but preferred in his late years to tarry beneath his own happy roof-tree and to watch the development of his children; to educate them in virtuous principles; to do his duty well as a neighbor, a friend, a philanthropist, and to enjoy through the lengthening shadows of a useful life the sweet companionship of his loving wife. * * *

"He was my Gamaliel, my oracle, from whom any docile youth could learn 'the wisdom of the wise, the strength that nerves the strong, and the grace that gathers around the noble.' In broad philanthropy and charity, in learning and culture, I thought him the greatest man I ever saw; and, in Roman virtue, severity of morals, and dignity of character, the most august and admirable.

"I particularly remember his tender sympathies for that unfortunate class whose reasons were overthrown, and his theories upon the treatment of mental diseases. And now, as I look upon the splendid pile which has taken the place of that happy homestead and reflect upon the noble and Christly purposes to which it is today dedicated, I can but think if that grand old man, with all his tender solicitude for a better and holier treatment of the mind diseased, could revisit the ground on which his happy homestead stood and see the changes for himself, he would rejoice that things are just as they are. All honor to the memory of General Calvin Jones!"

The beautiful address by Judge Sneed, just quoted, first appeared in the Evening Democrat, of Memphis. For a copy I am indebted to the sketch in the Wake Forest Student, by President Taylor, to which allusion has already been made.

General Jones was a deeply religious man and a communicant in the Episcopal Church. During the time he resided in Raleigh, there was no house of worship owned by his Church, the parish of Christ Church not being organized until August 21, 1821. He was similarly situated at Wake Forest. On April 17, 1834, not long after his arrival in Tennesee, he was one of the founders of the parish of St. James, in Bolivar, an organization having for its first rector the Reverend Daniel Stephens, and formed during the Episcopate of Bishop Otey, a disciple of the great Bishop Ravenscroft, of North Carolina. Two of the clerical friends of General Jones, Bishops Otey and Green (the latter elevated to the Episcopate after the General's death), had been students and later tutors in the University of North Carolina when Jones was a trustee. General Jones enjoyed the companionship of thoughtful clergymen of all creeds. In addition to association with such leaders of his own Church as Bishops Ravenscroft, Otey, Polk, and Green, he had been one of the many Episcopalians, in the early days of Raleigh, forming a part of the congregation of the scholarly "pastor of the city," the Reverend William McPheeters, of the Presbyterian Church. A strong friendship also sprang up between himself and Elder John Purify, a forceful leader of the Baptists of North Carolina. As heretofore mentioned, General Jones and Elder Purify were residents of the same country neighborhood in the northeastern section of Wake County, where Wake Forest College was later established.

General Jones was a man of striking appearance. He was 5 feet 10½ inches in height, deep-chested, and weighed about 240 pounds. His eyes bore a kindly expression and were hazel in color, his hair was brown, his forehad high, his nose slightly Grecian, and his mouth clearly portrayed the firmness and decision which marked his character through life. Viewed from any standpoint, he was a strong man—strong morally, mentally, and physically. Three portraits of him are now in Wake County: one in the Grand Lodge Hall, and one in the office of the Adjutant General, at Raleigh; and one at Wake Forest—the last mentioned having been presented to the college by Wake Forest Lodge, now No. 282, but originally No. 97.

I have now told what I have been able to learn of the upright life and honorable career of Calvin Jones. His memory, it is true, does not stand broadly emblazoned on history's page as:

> "One of the few, the immortal names,
> That were not born to die"—

but we do no violence to truth in portraying him as consistent Christian, a vigilant patriot, an accomplished physician, a versatile scholar, a loyal Mason, and a hospitable gentleman, well worthy to be classed "among those choicest spirits who, holding their consciences unmixed with blame, have been in all conjunctures true to themselves, their country, and their God."

Sec. 2495. Scale of depreciation of Confederate currency established. Ord. of Convention, 1865. 1866, c. 39, s. 1.

WHEREAS, by an ordinance of the convention, entitled "an ordinance declaring what laws and ordinances are in force, and for other purposes," ratified on the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, it is made the duty of the general assembly to provide a scale of depreciation of the Confederate currency, from the time of its first issue to the end of the war; and it is further therein declared that "all executory contracts, solvable in money, whether under seal or not, made after the depreciation of said currency before the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, and yet unfilled (except official bonds and penal bonds payable to the estate), shall be deemed to have been made with the understanding that they were solvable in money of the value of said currency," subject, nevertheless, to evidence of a different intent of the parties to the contract. Therefore,

The following scale of depreciation is hereby adopted and established as the measure of value of one gold dollar in Confederate currency, for each month, and the fractional parts of the month of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, from the first day of November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, to the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, to wit:

Scale of depreciation of Confederate currency, the gold dollar being the unit and measure of value from November first, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, to May first, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five:

Dolly Payne Madison

By J. A. Hoskins

The most famous personage born within the confines of historic Guilford County was undoubtedly Dorothy Payne Madison, wife of our fourth President. She first saw the light of day May 20, 1768, near old New Garden Quaker meeting house, (Guilford College.) The records of this meeting show that "John Payne was born ye 9 of ye 2 Mo., 1740 (old style), Mary, his wife, was born ye 14 of ye 10 Mo., 1743. Walter, their son, was born ye 15 of ye 11 Mo., 1762. William Temple, their son, was born ye 17 of ye 6 Mo., 1766. Dolly, their daughter, was born ye 20 of ye 5 Mo., 1768." This from the New Garden monthly meeting minutes, which also show: "1765 11 Mo. John Payne produced a certificate for himself and his wife from the Monthly Meeting of Cedar Creek in Virginia, dated the 12th of 10 Mo., 1765, which was read and accepted."

"1768, 11 Mo., New Garden Preparative Meeting informs this Meeting that John Payne requests a certificate to the Monthly Meeting at Cedar Creek in Virginia. Richard William and B. Bales are appointed to enquire into the life and conversation and affairs and if they find nothing to hinder prepare one and produce it to next meeting."

"1769, 2 Mo. The Friends continued last Mo. to correct the certificate of John Payne having complied therewith and produced it to this meeting, which was read and signed."

Thus it appears clear, unmistakable and unimpeachable that John Payne and family settled at New Garden in November, 1765, and that he returned to Cedar Creek, Hanover County, Virginia, in February, 1769. In the meantime William Temple Payne was born in 1766, and Dolly, May 20, 1768. She, as an infant, lived at New Garden, Guilford County, North Carolina, less than one year. (Guilford was formed from Rowan and Orange 1771.) Tradition has it that the exact spot of the Payne home was just south of the residence of Dr. M. F. Fox, and near thereto.

John Adams, writing to his wife from Philadelphia, said, "I dined yesterday with Madison. Mistress Madison is a fine woman. Her sisters equally so. One of them is married to George Steptoe Washington. The ladies are of a Quaker family, one of North Carolina." Agnes Carr Sage says, "She was born in an old North Carolina homestead."

Sarah K. Bolton says, "Dolly Madison was born May 20, 1772, on a North Carolina plantation." Ellett says, "John Payne removed to North Carolina where was situated the plantation his father had given him," and that "Dorothy Payne was born May 20, 1772." Appleton says, "Dorothy Payne was born in North Carolina May 20, 1772." Thus we are confronted with a discrepancy of even four years as to her birth. This is accounted for by the vanity of this great and good woman. Her early biographers got her age wrong and the others followed. Edna Kent Bernard, in "Dorothy Payne. Quakeress," (1909) sets this matter right quoting records of North Carolina, Virginia and Philadelphia Friends' Meetings and sketches her career in a most charming manner, throwing many sidelights on her brilliant life and the early history of Virginia and the Quaker settlement at Cedar Creek as well as the early slavery question.

The first publication setting forth the true facts of her birth at New Garden, North Carolina, appeared in the American Friend, April 12, 1906, and was written by Miss Julia S. White, the very capable librarian of Guilford College. It is certain that she was the first writer to give the true recorded facts. There had been traditions as to her birth here. I heard of these as far back as 45 years ago, but had no tangible proof until Miss White gave the record and minutes of the New Garden Meeting in her article in the American Friend. Dorothy Payne was the granddaughter of John Payne, an English gentleman of wealth and education, who migrated to Virginia early in the 18th century. He married Anna Fleming, granddaughter of Sir Thomas Fleming, one of the early settlers of Jamestown, and a great granddaughter of the Earl of Wigton, Scotland. His son, John Payne, Dorothy's father married the beautiful Mary Coles, first cousin of Patrick Henry. She was the daughter of William Coles, of "Coles Hill," Hanover County. Jefferson had been her ardent admirer, and in earlier years the rival of John Payne. She had met at "Enniscorthy," the home of her cousin, Col. John Coles, of Albemarle County, many of the great men of Virginia, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Randolph. Patrick Henry, Wirt, Edmunds, Henry Lee, the Winstons, and many others. This place was 10 miles from "Monticello." The Paynes were descended from a brother of Sir Robert Payne, M. P., for Huntingdonshire.

John Payne was a member of the house of delegates of 1780. He removed to Philadelphia in 1783. He had manumitted his slaves prior thereto. He was among the first to do so in Virginia. Dorothy Payne married John Todd, attorney at law, of a prominent Quaker family of Philadelphia. They were married in old Pine Street meeting house, according to the solemn marriage ceremony of the Friends. Her sister, Lucy Payne, married George Steptoe Washington, nephew, namesake and ward of President Washington. Her sister, Anna, married Senator Richard Cutts, from Maine, then part of Massachussetts, in the year 1804. Adele Cutts, their granddaughter, married Senator Stephen A. Douglas. She was his second wife. She afterwards married Gen. George R. Williams. Dorothy Payne Todd married James Madison in 1794 at "Harewood," the home of her sister, Lucy Payne Washington. She died in 1849, surviving her distinguished husband 12 years. Many of her letters are undated. She was whimsical as to her age. She ignored birthdays. She greatly preferred to forget them. This was one of her foibles. As William Temple Payne, her brother, was a Tar Heel and a Guilfordian, I will add that he died in 1795. He never married.

Dorothy Payne Madison during 11 administrations was the intimate friend of our Presidents and their families. She knew well Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, the Adamses, Jackson, Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler and Taylor, Hamilton, Clay, Calhoun and Douglas.

Burr had the honor of introducing Madison to the charming Mistress Todd. There were no more cultured people, nor polite society in Virginia than was to be found at Cedar Creek. Clay was born near there in Hanover County, as was Patrick Henry. Patrick Henry and the Winstons had Quaker ancestors.

Mistress Madison wore the plain dress and "pretty Quaker cap" until her advent as mistress of the White House, and used the plain language of Friends, the soft "thee" and "thou" all her days. Her manner was irresistably charming. She was loved and honored during many years. The simple country maiden, reared by conscientious Quaker parents, was transformed into the queen of American society, and one of the greatest of women. She was a graceful, tactful leader of society. She was named for her mother's friend and cousin, Dorothea Spottswood Dandridge, the granddaughter of Governor Spottswood. This lady married first Nathan West Dandridge and afterwards became the second wife of Patrick Henry.

The New Garden Monthly Meeting was set up 1754. The colonists from New Garden, Pa., and the Island of Nantucket, were a sturdy, thrifty people and from them have sprung many good and great men and women. New Garden boarding school was established in the year 1837. It was succeeded by Guilford College. Prior thereto the Friends maintained monthly meeting schools of a high order. New Garden boarding school and Guilford college have always stood high as educational institutions.

Bruce's Cross Roads

By Joseph A. Hoskins

The name of Charles Bruce is deserving of mention in connection with Bruce's Cross Roads (now Summerfield). In colonial times, and up to 1832 when he died, aged almost 100 years, he lived here.

Charles Bruce was a remarkable man. He was a strong whig and ardent patriot. Was member, together with Ralph Gorrell, Joseph Hines, Isham Browder and David Caldwell, of the Halifax Congress (November, 1776) that framed our constitution and organized the state. Was appointed agent, with Daniel Gillespie, by the Provincial Congress (April, 1776) to purchase firearms and ammunition for the troops. Was made a member of the Committee of Accounts by the Halifax Congress. Appointed general recruiting officer (September, 1777) by council of state. Member House of Commons 1782. State Senator 1783. Appointed 1782, together with Fraugott Bagge and James Hunter, auditor for Salisbury District for settlement of claims against the state. 1784 was made Commissioner of Confiscated Property. Member of Council of State under Governor Alexander Martin, 1790, and was councillor at the time of General Washington5s southern tour, 1791, and had the honor of entertaining the President on his reutrn trip north after leaving Salem. Was justice of peace for many years and postmaster for thirty years. Was Chairman of County Court for many years and on Boundary Commission, 1785, for dividing Guilford County. Was on commission to build courthouse and jail at Greensboro. County seat moved 1808. He married Elizabeth Benton, stated to be a sister of the father of Senator Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri. (Bruce had lived in Orange County, N. C., before settling in Rowan (now Guilford), as had Mr. Benton.)

Mr. Bruce's home was a center of the revolutionary spirit and a meeting place for the organization, Friends of Liberty. He was a large land owner and slaveholder, merchant and surveyor. He obtained grants from Granville and State of North Carolina for thousands of acres in what is now Guilford and Rockingham Counties. Bruce's Cross Roads was a general muster ground. In 1776 Captain Dent was killed there at a general muster, being one of the first North Carolinians to fall in the struggle. Ashe says: "In Guilford, Colonel James Martin assembled the Whigs at the Cross Roads, but the Tories resolutely pressed against them. A company of which Samuel Deviney, one of the former Regulators, was the head, on being opposed by Captain Dent, shot him." It was at Bruce's Cross Roads that the encounter between Light Horse Harry Lee and Colonel Tarleton occurred February 12, 1781. Lee was encamped at Bruce's house on Greene's retreat to the Dan. He was attacked by Tarleton and Lee's bugler boy, Gillis, was killed in cold blood. In the counter attack Lee avenged the death of the devoted bugler by slaying seven of the dragoons. Greene and his army continued the retreat, pursued by Cornwallis. That night part of the British army under GeneralO'Hara camped at Bruce's. He had fled with Colonel Lee across the Dan and was with him at the Battle of Guilford March 15. The Charles Bruce home plantation is now owned by Joseph A. Hoskins. The Bruce house stood where now stands the Hoskins home. It is traditionary that the Bruces were exiles from Scotland, and that antipathy to the house of Hanover partly accounts for Charles Bruce's extreme Whig principles and great activity in the Revolution.

Two other names are worthy of mention in connection with Bruce"s Cross Roads. It was here that Hezekiah Saunders kept a wayside inn and where the stage coaches north to south changed horses. In the autumn of 1822 two young men from New England journeying to South Carolina and Georgia, respectively, alighted from the stage coach to breakfast with Mr. Saunders. The young men were Sidney Porter and Nathanial Boyden. Impressed by the attratcions of the locality and the bountiful repast, they decided instanter to end the journey and cast in their fortunes with the people of the Old North State. This decision changed the whole course of their lives.

The Saunders house still stands and is the home of Mrs. Catherine Brittain. Nathanial Boyden taught school here fall and winter of 1822, boarding with Mr. Saunders. He became famous as eminent lawyer, Whig Congressman and Supreme Court Judge, and the ancestor of the distinguished family of that name in this state. Colonel A. H. Boyden ,of Salisbury, is a son of Judge Nathaniel Boyden.

It is probably not too much a stretch of imagination to conjecture that Sidney Porter lingered many days at this hospital hostelry, before finally locating in Greensboro. He became the ancestor of the distinguished Porter family of Guilford. The versatile genius, William Sidney Porter (O. Henry), is probably the most famous offspring of this Porter family.

Referring to Charles Bruce. His son George represented Guilford in the House of Commons 1798-99 and 1801, and was a member of the State Senate, 1802. He was a soldier of the Revolution. Another son of Charles, Abner, was Clerk of the Court of Orange County for many years. Hon. Willis Dowd, of Charlotte, was a grandson of Abner, as is Prof. Jerome Dowd, of the University of Oklahoma, and great-grandsons of Charles Bruce.

Charles Bruce, Jr., settled in Darlington, S. C., and became ancestor of the family of that name there and at Camden. Alfred and Felix settled in Caroll County, Tennessee, on the lands of their father, Charles Bruce. James Allen lived at Summerfield in the old days prior to 1840. William E. Allen, of Greensboro, is a grandson. The postoffice was called Bruce's Cross Roads in colonial times and up to about 1820. It was one of the important settlements in the county, ante-dating Martinsville (Guilford Courthouse). It was on the great stage road north to Piedmont and Western North Carolina, upper South Carolina and Georgia. This continued the leading thoroughfare till the coming of the North Carolina Railroad.

When Greene withdrew after Battle of Guilford, he sent his baggage via Bruce's Cross Roads to the Dan. This road is still called Baggage Road. The late Charles H. Wilson was a garndson of Hezekiah Saunders, as is John B. Ogburn. Mrs. J. Thomas Rhodes is a granddaughter.

The Raising, Organization and Equipment of North Carolina Troops During the Civil War

By Walter Clark,
Chief Justice of North Carolina Supreme Court

When Sir Walter Scott issued the first of his novels in 1805 it dealt with the war of 1745, the last attempt of the Stuarts to regain the throne, and he entitled it "Waverley, or 'Tis 60 Years Since." It is almost sixty years since our great struggle began in 1861, and it would be far easier for a great writer like Scott to clothe the palpable and familiar with the glamor of romance than it is for me to present to this generation an accurate, lifelike picture of the supreme effort of North Carolina in 1861-5.

As compared with the great world struggle now in progress the War of 1861-5 seems small, but up to that time it was the greatest which the world had known. It lasted for four years, and the Federals first and last put into line 2,850,000 soldiers. On the Southern side there were between six hundred and eight hundred thousand. The exact number cannot be settled, for our records have been largely lost. It is safe to say that no war was ever entered into with greater unpreparedness on both sides. When the South went in she had no government but had to form one. It had not a soldier but had to call out an army, clothe, arm, and discipline it. It had no treasury and not a dollar to put in it. It was without factories to make munitions or arms and without adequate facilities to clothe or feed the troops, for we had relied for years upon the North for manufactured articles and upon the Northwest for meat and corn and flour.

The North had as a nucleus a small army and a navy, an organized government and a treasury. But the state of unpreparedness on both sides was beyond description. After the first battle of Manassas the Confederate Government notified the Governor of this State that there was not enough powder in the Confederacy for another day's battle. This may be one of the reasons why the Confederates did not pursue their advantage by capturing Washington. So little aware was the North of the magnitude of the struggle that many of their regiments then, and even later, were "100 days men," enlisted for that period, with the impression that the Rebellion could be put down in that time, and by undrilled men. In North Carolina the first regiment we sent out, the "Bethel Regiment," of glorious memory, commanded by Col. (later Lieut. General) D. H. Hill, was enlisted for six months, and the rest of our regiments for twelve months, except the ten State regiments which, with a foresight not shown probably by any other Southern State, were enlisted for "three years, or the war." These regiments were officered by appointment of the Governor, while the others, which were volunteer regiments, elected their own officers.

The condition of things in the spring of 1861 would be hard to describe. Though South Carolina seceded on 20 December, and other Southern States followed in January and February, and the new hostile government inaugurated its president at Montgomery, 22 February, 1861, General Lee accepted a commission from Abraham Lincoln in the latter part of March, and did not resign till after Virginia seceded on 23 April. In the meantime hostilities had been begun by the attack on Fort Sumter on 12 April, and prior to that time the Star of the West had been fired on in an attempt to enter Charleston harbor. Indeed there were officers afterwards prominent in the Confederate Army who did not leave the United States service till May. General Martin, afterwards so conspicious in organizing men and material for North Carolina, did not resign from the United States Army till our Ordinance of Secession was enacted, 20 May. And on his way home from his distant post in Kansas he met on the train his old army friend, U. S. Grant, and traveled amicably with him through Illinois and Indiana to Cincinnati, Ohio.

The utter inability of the people of both sections to foresee the magnitude and duration of the struggle before them, added to the utter lack of preparedness on both sides, is shown by a common saying by speakers on both sides in raising volunteers, that they would "contract to wipe up the blood that would be spilled with a silk pocket handkerchief." This was true of the Confederate Government, which persistently refused, in the summer of 1861, to negotiate a loan of six hundred millions of dollars which was tendered by capitalists in Europe, and President Davis gave positive instructions that in no event should more than $15,000,000 be accepted. If the loan had been taken, of the magnitude offered, the Confederacy would early have been supplied with ammunition, arms, provisions, and a navy, and the blockade later, to which we owed our defeat, would have been impossible. It is quite clear that it was the failure of the Confederate officials to take this step of preparedness, even at that late date, which rendered vain the valor of our troops and the genius of our generals. Indeed, aside from the preparedness which we could even then have made, the European governments would have intervened, if necessary, to have preserved the investment of their capitalists in the $600,000,000 loan which would have been taken if secured on cotton.

There can hardly be found an instance in history of equal want of preparedness except in our War of 1812, when a force of 4,000 British soldiers, returning from the West Indies, landed at Point Lookout at the mouth of the Potomac, 2,500 of whom defeated the American Volunteers at Bladenboro, when President Madison (a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1787) and the Secretary of War, Monroe (a soldier of the Revolution), were present. It is said that 250 men of the British Army composed the force which captured Washington, burned the Capitol and the White House and destroyed public property, and that our Capital City was held that night by one single British soldier as a sentry on Capitol Hill.

In North Carolina, though we did not secede till 20 May, 1861, the Legislature which met 1 May provided for the raising of ten regiments "for three years, or the war," for the raising of volunteers and organization for the coming struggle. In a short time General Martin was made Adjutant General, Major John Devereux, Quartermaster, and Major Thomas D. Hogg, Commissary. At once steps were taken to procure supplies. Horses for the cavalry and transport service were brought from Kentucky, which was then still neutral ground, and were hurried in droves through the mountains. Saddles and harness material were secured by special agents in New Orleans and rushed to Raleigh by rail. Powder works and arsenals for the manufacture and remodeling of arms were created. Thirty-seven thousand muskets were taken possession of by the State in the capture of the arsenal at Fayetteville. These were mostly flint and steel, and skilled workmen were secured to turn them into percussion weapons, but even then so scarce was the supply of guns that we manufactured a large number of pikes, which were wooden poles shod at one end with iron (samples of which can be seen in our Historical Museum), and with these some organizations were equipped while others were entirely unarmed. Indeed, it was not until after several victories that, by the capture of arms and munitions, especially by the careful gathering up of the arms thrown away by the Northern troops in flight, we were able adequately to equip our soldiers. In fact, it was not until after the "Seven Days Battles Around Richmond," in June and July, 1862, that, by means of the large captures of guns and cannon, the South was at all able to adequately equip its soldiers. During the entire war a large part of our equipment of arms and munitions consisted of those taken from the enemy.

In May, 1861, the State established camps of instruction at various points, and skilled armorers were gradually educated, by the aid of the few we had, to make sabres, bayonets, and swords. For a long while percussion caps were made by a private firm (Kuester) in Raleigh. Shoes and clothing factories were located at several points in the State. Quartermaster, commissary, and ordnance stores were collected, and cannon were provided for the artillery largely by melting down the church bells, which source of supply was supplemented from time to time by captures from the enemy.

The energy and ability shown by North Carolina in these preparations were very remarkable, and showed the innate ability of our population.

The most remarkable instance in this line was the purchase by the State in 1862 of the Ad-Vance and three other vessels and the sending by this State of Mr. John White of Warrenton and Col. Duncan K. McRae to sell cotton and purchase supplies for our soldiers. No other State did this, nor did the Confederate Government. It is doubtful whether the State could either have clothed or fed its people but for this enterprise. The list of importations is a curious one and reflects the needs of the State. From the records now being complied by Dr. D. H. Hill we find that ordnance stores to the amount of $488,000 and cotton cards to the value of $594,000 was brought into Wilmington. It was through these cotton and wool cards that the women of the State were able to clothe their families during the last two years of the war. Even the tacks with which these cards were fastened to the wooden handles had to be imported with them. Among the importations were cloth for uniforms, overcoats, jackets, trousers, caps, shoes, boots, sacks, angora skirts, oil cloth, oil tape, thread, button, paper, calf skins, leather, medicines, dyes, belting, cobbler's awls, needles, bleaching powders, buckles, scythe blades, iron, copper, wire, nails, and many other articles.

Most of the imported cloth was manufactured into uniforms for the men or sold to the officers. This work was done in a most systematic manner. The manufacturing establishment at Raleigh was presided over by Capt. J. W. Garrett, and afterwards by Major W. W. Pierce and Major H. A. Dowd. It was in the Quartermaster's Department, of which Major John Devereux had general supervision. The clothing was cut by expert tailors and then given out to women to be made into garments. Some of the material was shipped to various towns in the State and made up by clubs of women and shipped back. Blockade running was not only an absolute necessity to the State but was a success financially, for on 9 March, 1865, near the end of the war, the business showed a profit of $1,325,000. This was largely made of course by the difference between the price paid by the State for cotton and the value of the articles brought back by the steamers on their return voyages to the State. The steamers ran the blockade from Wilmington nearly due south to Nassau, in the Bahamas, to which point the supplies were brought without risk from England and stored.

Not only were the North Carolina troops supplied with uniforms but a very large part of the cloth and the uniforms were sold to the Confederate Government. When Longstreet's corps were sent to the west, where it enabled the army to win the victory at Chicamauga, it was furnished with new clothing entirely from North Carolina, both for the men and officers.

The greater portion of the medical supplies for the Southern army was thus brought in by the North Carolina blockading steamers, and was unobtainable otherwise.

Major T. D. Hogg, who was head of the Ordnance Department and later of the Commissary Department of the State, kept on hand, as he said, "Everything from frying pans to cannon," and the department supplied every conceivable article to the army. In the Ordnance Department the State was constantly manufacturing or remodeling arms and repairing and putting into condition those captured from time to time from the enemy or picked up on the battlefield. Nitre for gunpowder was obtained mostly by digging up the ground in the smokehouses throughout the State and leaching out the nitre.

The State contracted with the Confederate Government to make all the clothing for the North Carolina troops after they were turned over to the Confederacy. During the first winter of 1861-1862 there was so large a rush of men to arms that the soldiers suffered considerably from cold. So great was the destitution that the women of the State, as patriotic then as now, took up the carpets from their floors, cut them up and lined them with coarse cloth and sent them on to the troops for use as blankets. Agents were sent as far South as New Orleans, and these also scoured the State, to buy blankets and warm clothes for the North Carolina troops.

Not only did the State make clothing it went into the manufacture of arms, and at the Fayetteville arsenal thousands of good rifles were made. Later, rifle factories were established as private enterprises at Jamestown, Greensboro, and other points, and a firm in Wilmington made sabres and bayonets. A boring machine was devised by which smooth-bore muskets were turned into rifles, and thousands of antiquated muskets were changed from flint and steel to percussion locks.

The State also arranged with manufacturers at many points in this State to go into the manufacture of shoes. To some of these the State furnished the hides, and in many cases the State bought green hides and had them tanned on shares. Agents were sent into all the western counties to buy hides, leather, and wool. These were collected and hauled to the manufacturers, to a very large amount in wagons, or accumulated in warehouses, for it must be remembered at that time we had not more than a third of our present railroad mileage.

To keep on hand a large supply of cotton goods, the State agreed to take the total output of many of the cotton mills and pay them 75 per cent profit. The lack of clothing among the people at home became so severe that certain days were set apart on which the output of the mills might be sold, and on those days large numbers of women came from all quarters to buy the cotton yarns or cloth. In some cases they walked even ten or twelve miles and carried their yarn and cloth home on their backs, and sometimes in carts or wagons.

Time fails me to go into all the various enterprises which the State inaugurated to support its armies in the field. Details are largely given by Major A. Gordon and Major W. A. Graham of the Adjutant General's Deperatment in the First Volume of the "N. C. Regimental Histories." A committee was appointed in 1867 to ascertain the amount expended by this State in aid of the war, composed of J. C. Harper, R. H. Battle, and H. W. Husted, whose report shows that the State expended for military purposes alone, to carry on the war (leaving out the last three months, for which the records were lost), more than $37,000,000. While part of this was in Confederate currency it is fair to estimate that full $20,000,000 was furnished by this State for that purpose. This was exclusive of the amounts which were spent by the several counties for the relief of the widows, wives, and children of the soldiers and to relieve distress among the old and infirm. The State established salt works on the coast and also took part in the manufacture of salt at Saltville, in Southwest Virginia. By this means the State, and especially the country districts, were supplied with that indispensable article.

In addition to these expenditures the State used a large sum in the blockade business. In that business the State imported $5,947,000 of goods, in addition to the cost of the steamer Ad. Vance and our three other vessels, the Don, the Hansa, and the Annie.

These various enterprises were largely suggested by and due to the energy of Gen. James G. Martin, who had seen service in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, but he was most ably seconded by Major John Devereux, Major T. D. Hogg, and the other officials under him. Governor Vance, being the Governor of the State at that time, assumed the responsibility for the Ad Vance and the entire system by which the State imported these necessary articles, and he did so against the advice of eminent counsel who assured him that such action would make him liable to impeachment. He reaped his reward in the approval of the soldiery, whom he kept warm and supplied with clothing, food, and other necessaries, and in the remembrance of the people at home whom he supplied with salt and other necessary articles, and he won the lasting gratitude of the women to whom he furnished the cotton cards which enabled them to clothe themselves and children, and this made him after the war invincible in the hearts of the people of North Carolina.

The "blockade-running" enterprise of this State was not adopted by any other Southern State nor, strange to say, by the Confederate Government, to whom the State turned over a large part of the supplies it received by these methods. When the war ended North Carolina still had on hand here and in London many thousand bales of cotton which it had bought for this trade and the largest supply of English cloth for soldiers and officers, which were stored at Greensboro. The enterprise was successful till September, 1864, when the Confederate Government, having taken for a cruiser the supply of anthracite coal brought from England which the *Ad. Vance had stored up in Wilmington for her own use, she was forced to use the bituminous and inferior coal from Chatham County, and the black trail of smoke that she made and a lowered speed caused her capture.

As to provisions, so large a part of Virginia was occupied b ythe enemy and the other Southern States being less fitted for raising corn and farther from Lee's army, more than half of the supplies of that army came from North Carolina. Major Hogg, the Commissary of this State, said that in the spring of 1865 North Carolina was feeding more than half of Lee's army.

* This was a double pun. The vessel was primarily named Ad-Vance, i.e., "to-Vance," and the "Advance" or first—not A. D. Vance.

It is to be remembered that the taxes of the Confederacy were largely levied in kind by the tithing bureau which received from each farm one-tenth of all the meat, corn, and other provisions raised which were put into the tithing warehouses and thence transported to the army from time to time as needed. There were tithing agents in each neighborhood who saw to it that the farmer turned over to the Government one-tenth of his produce, and over him was a tithing agent in each county. In a time of depreciated currency, and of an imperative demand for provisions by the army, no better system probably could have been devised.

The Confederate conscript law was adopted early in 1862 by which all men between 18 and 35 were taken for the army, with certain exemptions, on account of disability and public service. The age later was changed from 18 to 45. In the spring of 1864 the necessity of filling the ranks was such that boys from 17 to 18 were conscripted and formed into regiments and batalions of Junior Reserves, and those from 45 to 50 were likewise formed into Senior Reserves.

Nor should mention be omitted of the large supplies which were sent by the women of the State from their scanty stores to their relatives in the army. During the last three months of 1864, as Pollard's History states, $325,000 worth of supplies passed through the office in Richmond sent by the women of this State direct to our soldiers in our time of greatest destitution, in addition to what the State Government was officially sending to the troops.

Throughout the war it was noted, without contradiction, that the best supplied, best clothed and equipped soldiers of the whole army were from North Carolina.

I cannot undertake in the brief space of this article to narrate what would require a volume, in order to set out adequately the support which North Carolina furnished to the Confederacy. It must be recalled that while now the State has 2,500,000 people, by the census of 1860 she had only 992,622, of whom full one-third were negroes. These latter did their share in faithfully furnishing provisions raised on the farms for the support of the soldiers and of the people at home. To their credit there was not a single attempt, recorded in the four years, of insurrection or lawlessness. Out of less than 700,000 white population the State sent 125,000 splendid soldiers to the front besides the Home Guards, who preserved order, guarded bridges, and at times strengthened our lines in North Carolina. Many thousand negroes were also drafted from time to time to build breastworks and forts.

The proportion of soldiers furnished by this State to the Confederate cause was nearly one in every five of the total white population. This is a larger ratio than is now being furnished by Germany in her strenous efforts, though that country is largely aided by the enforced work of prisoners and of the population drafted fro mBelgium and other occupied territory, contrary to all the rules of civilized warfare and the express stipulations of the Hague treaties.

It is safe to say that of the armies of the thirteen Confederate States, more than one-sixth were soldiers from this State. This State also furnished fully one-fifth of the provisions and other supplies for the Confederate armies.

Unlike Germany, with its thirty years preparation for war, North Carolina went into the war totally unprepared. But she grappled the task which came to her, and no state on either side, and probably no state in history, furnished from its population a larger proportion of soldiers, nor from its material resources a larger support, to the cause in which it embarked than this Commonwealth. If the cause finally failed no blame can be laid upon a state which went into that war reluctantly but which, when it once entered, stinted neither in men, in courage or in supplies in its ardent support to the side which its people had espoused.

Tar River (The Name)

By Bruce Cotten

It seems to be well established, both by tradition and by official documents that this river was once sometimes called Taw River. Most of our North Carolina histories have so stated and there are numerous wills, deeds and other papers preserved which refer to it as Taw or Tor River.

Lawson in his thousand miles journey in 1701 appears to have crossed Tar River a few miles below the present town of Greenville. However, he calls it the Pampticough and neither in his text nor on his map does the name Tar, or Taw, appear.

Williamson calls it Taw River wherever referred to in his work, and says that in the Indian language the word Taw signifies the river of health.

Dr. Hawks repudiates this assertion of Williamson and says:

"Its name is not Tar, though Col. Byrd called it by that name more than one hundred years ago. Others have supposed its original Indian name to be Taw or Tor, which Williamson with his customary dogmatism, ignorantly states means 'Health.' It never had such a meaning in any dialect of the Algonquin or Iroquois that we have met with (and these were the two mother languages of the Indians of the eastern side of North Carolina) nor was there any such Indian Word as far as we can discover; though such a syllable formed from an Indian word, is found in the composition of Indian words, according to the known polythinseticism of our Indian tongues. But the river was notwithstanding, called Taw, for we find (as I am informed by a friend*) that name applied in a patent of 1729.

* H. T. Clark, Esq., of Edgecombe.

"Wheeler, Simms, Emmons and Cook, all modern authorities, repudiating 'Tar' call it 'Tau.'

"Mr. Clark thinks that from analogy, it should be written 'Taw' and cites the names Haw, Catawba, Chickasaw, Choctaw, where the syllable terminates with w.

"But the fact is that in the orthography of Indian names and words it is important to know to what country the individual belonged who first wrote them down for the eye of civilized man; otherwise the pronunciation may be mistaken.

"For ourselves while we are quite sure the river's true name never was Tar, we doubt whether Taw is the original word.

"Words of one syllable are exceedingly rare in the Indian languages, and especially in the name of places. They are almost invariably compounds.

"Its Indian name was Torpaeo and we think it should be so called now. Taw is but a corruption of the first syllable Tor. We have tried in vain to discover the meaning of the compound Tor-paeo."

Dr. Hawk's assertion that its Indian name was Torpaeo rests solely upon a map and an account of a journey accredited to John Lederer, a German, who claimed to have traveled far into the country south of Virginia in 1670.

Lederer, it seems, with certain Englishmen, was commissioned by Governor Berkely of Virginia to make the journey, for the purpose of exploration and for the purpose of discovering a pass over the mountains. His English companions deserted him on the upper James and Lederer claims that he made the journey accompanied only by an Indian guide named Jackzetavon.

Upon his return to Virginia he was received with insults and with such reproaches that he believed his life in danger; the Virginias very frankly disbelieving his statements as to his travels and discoveries.

Whereupon Lederer betook himself to Maryland where he succeeded in interesting the governor, Sir William Talbot, who having been convinced that he was "a modest and ingenious person and a pretty scholar" himself translated, from the Latin into English, his account of his journeyings and printed the whole, with a map in London in 1672.

This account of Lederer, as translated and published by Talbot, sets forth geographic conditions which we know could not have existed in North Carolina and the impression gained is that the Virginians were entirely right in their estimate of the man'h worth.

From the text it is impossible to recognize, positively, any part of North Carolina and the conviction is strong that Lederer never made the journey claimed, but has set forth, both in his text and on his map his impressions and idea of what that country was, as understood perhaps from Indians and frontier reports.

South of the Roanoke two rivers are shown, the Torpaeo and the Errico. Both are erroniously made to flow into Roanoke river.

The Torpaeo is undoubtedly intended for what is now Tar river and the Errico either the Neuse or Contentnea Creek. This arrangement of these streams is likewise shown on a map prepared for the Lords Proprietors in 1671, which for the interior of the country is the same as the Lederer map; one being a copy of the other so far as they relate to the interior of the country called Carolina.

This name Torpeaeo does not appear in any other description or map preserved of the country, but several Indian names compounded with the sound of "tor" subsequently appear on the map and in the records as well and are generally located on Tar River, or in the vicinity of Contentnea Creek.

Tauhunter was an Indian town either on the Tar, or on Contentnea Creek, more likely on the latter and the name seems to have been preserved in Nahunter Creek in Greene County.

Toisnot is the beautiful name of a creek and swamp in Wilson County and was the name of a pretty village in the same county, until changed into the homely compound of Elm City.

Other Indian names in that section had sounds that might have led into a corruption of Taw, or Tor. Lawson in describing his crossing of what seems to have been Contentnea Creek says it was called by the Indian Chattoukau. This name also appears to have been the Indian name for the point of land whereon New Bern stands, and is said to have been taken to New York by the Tuscarora Indians and as Chautauqua became the name of a lake, town and county in that state from which is called our modern Chautauqua.

Just how the Indians applied these names, whether to a stream, a location, to a general section or tribe cannot be said, but at least there were some words or names in the Indian dialect of the section between Tar River and the Neuse which could have been suggested to the early settlers to call this river Taw after their own Taw River in England from the vicinity of which many of them came. Indeed this seems a probable explanation of the early efforts to call it Taw.

Taw River in England is a beautiful little stream, having its source among the "Tors" of Dartmoor in Devonshire and flowing north into Bidiford Bay. These Tors, or huge blocks of granite that crown most of the hills, are a striking characteristic of the landscape in the county where Sir Walter Raleigh was born and the name Tor and Taw has been very plentifully applied to the topography of the surrounding country.

There are many prominent Tors such as Yes Tor, Back Tor, High Tor, Cor Tor and Hare Tor while besides Taw River we have Tawton, Torquey, Tor Bay and many other names that trace their origin directly to the Tors. The word is also spelled Tor and Taw just as to the river was in North Carolina.

The word is of Saxon origin though some say it was applied by the Romans to these hill tops in Devon because they sometimes present a shape resembling the Greek letter tau (?). However the word is applied in Devonshire to any elevation that has rocks on its summit, just as "scar" is used in Yorkshire. It is also said that the first marbles were made from the stone of these Tors, hence the game Taw, and the position of Taw is still a prominent position in the playing of that most scientific of all juvenile games now called marbles.

Very many of the early settlers who came to Virginia and North Carolina came from the vicinity of Taw River and the Tors of Devonshire. Indeed after the battle of Sedgmoore in 1685, Devonshire was almost depopulated so great was the exodus, enforced or otherwise, to different parts of the new world. Very many of these people found their way to Virginia and into North Carolina.

Coming first upon Tar River in what is now Edgecombe or Nash County, there is reason to believe that these early settlers did not know that it was the same stream that lower down was called Pamlico. The impression being that it was tributary to the Roanoke as set forth in the maps of Lederer and Ogilby. Indeed some Scotch families having early settled south of the Roanoke in what is now lower Halifax County, the section was called "The Scotland Neck" under the impression it would seem that it was on a neck formed by the confluence of these two streams, or by Fishing Creek and the Roanoke.

So these people christened this river, or attempted to christen it, Taw River after their own Taw River in far off Devonshire just as Englishmen have always wanted to carry their place names with them. We know of course, that the attempt failed and the river was called Tar almost as soon as it was called Taw. If there was something in the Indian dialect of the section that suggested Taw, Taw itself at once suggested Tar, in honor of the then principal commodity of the country through which it flows. So Tar River it has been called exclusively for many years now and will no doubt continue by that name always.

Those settlers who pushed their way down the river called it Tar while those who pushed their way up the river, from old Bath County called it Pamlico, and it was known as Pamlico far up into what is now Pitt County. Finally as the up stream settlement dominated, the town of Washington became the dividing line, below which it is called Pamlico, above which it is called Tar River.

Antique China Water-Pitcher, 1775 at Edenton

Its Masonic And Poetic Decorations

In the Masonic Lodge at Edenton, North Carolina, which was established in 1775 under a chart from the Duke of Beaufort, then grand master of Masons in England, there is a very old and unique china pitcher, supposed to have been purchased as a water-pitcher when the lodge was first organized. It is beautifully decorated; on one side is a ship under full sail, on another some scene connected with the exploits of the Knights Templar, and on the third the following verses interwoven with the different emblems:

"No sect in the world can with Masonry compare,
So ancient, so noble the badge which they wear,
That all other orders however exteemed,
Inferior to Masonry justly are deem'd.
We always are free,
And forever agree,
Supporting each other,
Brother helps brother,
No mortals on earth are so friendly as we.

The greatest of Monarchs, the wisest of men,
Freemasonry honoured again and again,
And nobles have quitted all other delights,
With joy to preside o'er our mystical rites.
We always are free, etc.

Tho' some may pretend we've no secrets to know,
Such idle opinions their ignorance show,
While others with raptures cry out they're revealed,
In Freemasons' bosoms they still lie concealed.
We always are free, etc.

Coxcombical pedants may say what they can,
Abuse us, ill use us, and laugh at our plan,
We'll temper our mortar, enliven our souls,
And join in a chorus o'er full flowing bowls.
We always are free, etc."

Preservation of North Carolina's World War Records

By R. B. House,

Collector of War Records for North Carolina Historical Commission

One of the first acts of the North Carolina Council of Defense was the appointment of a Historical Committee under the leadership of Mr. R. D. W. Connor, Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission. Thus, at the very beginning of the war, the State of North Carolina organized the work of preserving its history.

The Historical Committee strove by means of circular appeals to all citizens of the State, and by the appointment of representatives in the several counties, to preserve documents illustrating every phase of North Carolina's participation in the war.

The culmination of the Historical Committee's work was the enactment by the General Assembly in 1919 of the following provision for the collection of war records, and the preparation of a history, being sections 3-6 of Chapter 114, Public Laws of 1919.

"Section 3. That for the purpose of putting in permanent and accessible form the history of the contribution of North Carolina and of her soldiers, sailors, airmen, and civilians to the Great World War while the records of those contributions are available, the North Carolina Historical Commission is hereby authorized and directed to employ a person trained in the study of history and in modern historical methods of investigation and writing, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of said Historical Commission, to collect as fully as possible data bearing upon the activities of North Carolina and her people in the said Great World War, and from these to prepare and publish as speedily as possible an accurate and trustworthy illustrated History of North Carolina in the Great World War.

SEC. 4. The said history shall give a reliable account of the:

(a) Operations of the United States Government in North Carolina during the war;

(b) Operations of the North Carolina State Government in war times;

(c) Operations of county and local government in war times;

(d) War work of volunteer organizations;

(e) Military, naval, and air service of North Carolina units and of individual North Carolina soldiers, sailors, and airmen;

(f) Organization and services of the Home Defense;

(g) A roster of North Carolina soldiers, sailors, and airmen in the war;

(h) Services of North Carolinians in national affairs during the war;

(i) Effects of the war on agriculture, manufacturing, transportation, finance, trade and commerce in North Carolina;

(j) Social and welfare work among the soldiers and their dependents;

(k) Contributions of schools and churches to the war and the effect of war on education and religion;

(l) Such other phases of the war as may be necessary to set forth the contributions of the State and her people to this momentous event in the world's history.

SEC. 5. That after the preparation of such history the said Historical Commission shall have the same published and paid for as other State printing, and said Historical Commission shall offer such history for sale at as near the cost of publication as possible: Provided, that one copy of such history shall be furnished free to each public school library in North Carolina which shall apply for the same: Provided also, that said Historical Commission may exchange copies of said history for copies of other similar histories of the war; and Provided further, that all receipts from the sale of said history shall be covered into the State Treasury."

The North Carolina Historical Commission appointed R. B. House to direct the work of collecting war records. The Collector of War Records took up his duties June 16, 1919, under the foregoing Chapter enjoining on him the two-fold task of collecting all data concerning North Carolina in the World War, and the preparation of a history of North Carolina in the World War. The collection of data is at present the paramount purpose of the department.

In the chapter of the law outlining his duties, the plan for collecting war records extends from that of collecting data about the government of the United States, the government of North Carolina, the local government of counties and communities, down to the records of individual soldiers, sailors and civilians. The first step taken by the Collector was to make a survey of official records produced by the war. About this time representatives from other State War History Organization met in conference in Washington, D. C., to organize some general plan of surveying the archives of the national government and finding out what records were necessary for use by the States. The outcome of this conference was a committee to work with the Adjutant General and with the Navy Department to systematize the transcript of service records that will be given to the Adjutant Generals of the various States, and in the second place, the formation of an association with a membership of $200 a year, which association maintains a bureau of research in Washington for the purpose of assuring to each State its quota of records in the national government.

The next step was a survey of record-producing agencies in the State Departments. The records of the State Council of Defense, the State Food Administration, and the State Fuel Administration have been turned over to the Department of War Records. The Adjutant General is in constant coöperation with the Collector of War Records in regard to the preparation of a roster of all North Carolina men in the service. The departments of State, Education, Health, Agriculture, and Labor and Printing have been canvassed, and they are holding in reserve their correspondence until the Collector of War Records can go through these files and take out what pertains to the World War.

The official records of government organizations in the counties and the records of volunteer war work organizations are in a somewhat chaotic condition. Repeated circular letters to practically every such agency in the State, visits to them here and there, and the work of volunteer representatives of the Historical Commission in the various localities reveal the fact that in some cases records have been destroyed, in other cases that no records have been kept, and yet again that where records are kept the officials of the various organizations are lax in responding to the request of the Collector for these records.

In an effort to stimulate local interest in the various localities, the Collector of War Records has endeavored to secure in each county a representative for the white race and one for the colored race to organize and direct the work for the various counties. White collectors have been secured in sixty-four counties and colored collectors have been secured in sixty-two counties. The work of these collectors has been spasmodic and somewhat ineffective, and just now plans are maturing for a conference of these collectors to be held in Raleigh for the eastern collectors and in Salisbury for the western collectors, in an effort to put on a drive for war material in North Carolina and to organize a State association for the collection of war records.

Various organizations, however, have offered their coöperation to the Collector of War Records in getting together data concerning the war, notably the Red Cross, the American Legion, the D. A. R., and the North Carolina Division of the U. D. C. All of these organizations have passed resolutions approving the work of the Historical Commission and pledging themselves to appoint local committees to carry on the work. The D. A. R. is especially interested in compiling military records. The U. D. C. is also supplementing this work. The American Legion is preparing a type of blank which will be filled out in duplicate by each member of the Legion joining, one copy of which shall be sent to the Historical Commission. Also, after some efforts by correspondence, the North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs has pledged its support to the work, and they are preparing reports of their work. It seems that these war work organizations will eventually enable the Collector of War Records to secure individual reports from each community organization.

Response from local draft boards and county councils of defense has been so meager as to make a change of tactics necessary, and as yet no definite system of obtaining these records has been devised. It is hoped that an examination of the records of the State Council of Defense will open up ways of securing clues to information in the various counties that will supplement references to these counties in the general reports of the State Council of Defense.

Through the publicity given to this work and the efforts of particularly active collectors in various sections of the State and by correspondence with individuals possessing collections, a valuable collection of letters, photographs, scrap books, and other individual material is being brought together.

The general duties of the Collector of War Records may be divided under the heads of administrative work in the office, field work, publicity, and research. Under the head of administration comes the conduct of a voluminous correspondence, both by the writing and answering of individual letters and by the sending out of circular letters, several thousand of which have been issued from the office. The task of administration has somewhat overbalanced the other three divisions of the work. Field work on the whole has been unsatisfactory, because at present the general nature of the work is not sufficiently advertised in the various counties to make a trip very profitable, and better results have been accomplished by the securing of local organizations from the office. However, valuable clues of various material have been collected by trips in Pitt County, Halifax, Warren, Guilford and Orange counties, by a trip to the reunion of the Old Hickory Division in Greenville, S. C., and by a trip to the Conference of State War History Organizations in Washington, D. C.

In the department of publicity three bulletins have been issued by the office, which have been included in letters; one arguing for the preservation of materials as a civic duty, and two outlining in some detail the materials wanted and the methods by which they can be collected.

Research work has in general been devoted to answering questions coming in from various individuals, furnishing lists of soldiers in various communities, and in general acting as a clearing house of information about the State in the war.

Concrete results of this system may be shown by the following digest of materials on hand:

Of North Carolina units we have nine official histories and collections of official papers.

By correspondence with officers of the army and navy, twenty collections of individual records have been secured. Eleven collections of individual soldiers' letters, three diaries, official records of Distinguished Service Cross citations, some 300 photographs.

Histories of 33 chapters of the Red Cross, reports from the County Council of Defense in 14 counties, official reports on the five Liberty Loan drives, and a valuable collection of letters and reports showing individual features of these drives.

Lists of drafted men from every county in the State, complete records of the Food Administration, complete records of the Fuel Administration, complete records of the North Carolina Council of Defense.

Program of coöperation with the American Legion insuring all the records made by them up to date, complete records of the War Camp Community Service, fragmentary collection of material about the work of women in the war.

Five collections of county history, complete records of Jewish military service in North Carolina, and a miscellaneous collection on economics, education, religion; the New York Times war volumes, 20 in all; complete files of the Army and Navy Journal through the years of the war; files of the Stars and Stripes, with the exception of about 20 numbers; and miscellaneous periodicals, pamphlets and publications not kept in the State Library.

While this digest of material attempts to outline the nature of documents on hand, nevertheless no elaborate system of cataloguing and digesting this material has been attempted, and therefore it is quite possible that information more than is mentioned in the above digest may be found.

The materials in hand are very fragmentary and the work is unsatisfactory from the standpoint of publication. This is due to three causes: First, the fact that most of the documents desired are not yet mature enough for collection, most of them being in the hands of the organization preparing them. In the second place, the people are not yet educated to the full value of preserving war records and are correspondingly unresponsive to pleas for help. In the third place, the force of the Department of War Records is entirely inadequate to a speedy survey and canvass of so large a State as North Carolina.

On the other hand, it is extremely doubtful whether a larger force and an attempt to speed up the work would produce paying results, for the simple reason that the collecting and digesting of this material is entirely a matter of time and study.

A more extensive and hearty coöperation of the people of North Carolina, however, is absolutely essential to success in this undertaking. The people possess the records to do with what they will, and the success of the Collector of War Records waits on their pleasure. If they choose to pay no attention to the need of prompt and speedy action in preserving records that are speedily being destroyed, the history of the war must be consequently incomplete. But if they choose to coöperate with the Collector, both in giving him records in their personal possession, and in urging like action on their neighbors, then nothing can prevent the history from being full and accurate, for the work has started in ample time.

The Collector of War Records urges, therefore, that all patriotic citizens of North Carolina donate enough of their time and attention to finding out what is wanted of them. A postal card to the Collector of War Records will bring full particulars. And there is no citizen of the State who cannot be of service in preserving the history of these times.

Some Autograph Writings of General Joseph Graham

Miss Hinton:—I hand you for publication in the Booklet some autograph writings of Gen. Joseph Graham, which I did not have until two or three years after the publication of the book, "Gen. Joseph Graham and his Revolutionary Papers."

1st. Autobiography of Gen. Jos. Graham.

"I was the third son by a second wife; my father lived in the State of Pennsylvania in Chester County near a mill on White Clay Creek, then belonging to the Hon. Judge Evans. I was born on the 13th of October, 1759, at said place, about five years after which my father died leaving behind him three sons and two daughters, the oldest of which was but nine years of age. He had a lease of the land of said Evans which expired about a year after his decease. This induced my mother at that period to remove to Carolina, as she had been encouraged to do by a distant relation who lived there. She removed in the autumn of the year 1765 to Mecklenburg County in North Carolina, and the winter following moved as far to the south as Tyger River. The land she settled on not being her own and the situation being almost a frontier to the Indians, together with the weakness of the settlement so that no prospect offered for the schooling of her children, induced her to return to Mecklenburg in the year 1767 after residing two years on Tyger. Having procured a tract of land nigh Charlotte a servant man whom she brought out together with us cleared some land, got up a cabin and not long after sent us to school. My oldest brother by this time having acquired more steadiness from his age than the rest of us, or perhaps his capacity was better, made considerable progress in writing, arithmetic, etc., in so much that she was generally advised by the neighbors to send him to the grammar school which together with his own inclination perusaded her to agree he began in the year —74. The interest due on the money coming to us of my father's estate was the only fund promised to support his education, her finances by this time would not admit of any aid and that was not more than sufficient for that purpose. He having the advantage of a number of books besides those of Greek and Latin I did not fail to read them with attention, especially History, Geography and the Sciences, still had it in view to go to the grammar school if circumstances would admit."

"He never realized his anticipations to attend Queen's College or the grammar school as it was generally called. About the time he and George would have been ready to enter the school, they entered the American Army and served during the war, George entering in December, 1775, and Joseph on May 18, 1878. Not having sufficient money from the funds designated for the education of himself and his brothers, he and George concluded that as John was the oldest they would give him the first opportunity, that it was better to have one boy well educated than three with only a partial education. John graduated at Queen's College in 1778, and afterwards attended Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, having read medicine with Dr. Rush, one of the most noted physicians of that time, who took him into practice with him. He afterwards became a surgeon in the Revolutionary Army.

2. There was also found in his own handwriting two pieces of paper, "James Graham," who was his father, and "George Graham," who was an elder brother.

James Graham.

"At the age of eighteen he emigrated from the Carlingford Bay, in the County of Down, Ireland, in the year 1733, to the then province of Pennsylvania.

"By tradition in the family he was a grandson of a follower and kinsman of the celebrated Montrose, who made such a figure in the civil wars in Scotland in the reign of Charles I, and when the English Army prevailed in Scotland, Montrose fled to Holland, and his adherents, among whom was a clan of the Grahams, and others, passed over into the north of Ireland, where many of their descendants yet reside. James Graham dying when his children were young, his widow moved with the family to Mecklenburg, N. C., when his son George was ten years old."

GEN. GEORGE GRAHAM.

"He was the son of James Graham, who at the age of 18 migrated from Carlingford Bay in the County of Dawn, Ireland, in the year 1733 to the then province of Pennsylvania. By a tradition in the family he was grandson of a follower and kinsman of the celebrated Montrose, who made such a figure in the civil wars in Scotland in the reign of Charles the First, and when the English Army prevailed in Scotland Montrose fled to Holland and his adherents, among whom was a clan of the Grahams and others, passed over into the north of Ireland, where many of their descendants yet reside. James Graham dying when his children were young, his widow moved with the family to Mecklenburg, North Carolina, when George was 10 years old."

In "Gen. Joseph Graham and his Revolutionary Papers" there are accounts of James and George Graham to which the reader can refer for further notice of them.

March 1, 1920. W. A. GRAHAM.

By John D. Hawkins

Colonel Philemon Hawkins, of Pleasant Hill, Warren County, North Carolina, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, having for many years entertained the desire to call together his descendants and connexions, as well as those of his late father, Col. Philemon Hawkins, senior, deceased, at his late residence in Warren county, with the view, thus assembled, to unite in bearing testimony to his worth and to his memory, and to cement together more closely the whole family union, did, on the 28th day of September, 1829, thus assemble them, as well as health and circumstances permitted; and he invited many respectable friends to associate upon the occasion, having previously caused the old family Mansion House of the deceased to be fitted up. When thus assembled, he called upon his grandson, Leonidas Polk, and great grandson of the deceased, to offer up to the Throne of Grace a prayer upon the occasion, who delivered an elegant and a very appropriate prayer. And he called upon his son, John D. Hawkins, and grandson of the deceased, to deliver an oration commemorative of his history, and his virtue; when he delivered the following:

My relatives and respected hearers:

I am called upon by Col. Philemon Hawkins, now the elder, to fulfil a trust, which his great desire to greet his relatives and friends, influenced at the same time by the most profound filial veneration, has induced him to impose. It is for me to attempt on this day to do justice to the character and memory of Col. Philemon Hawkins, senior, deceased. The task is a novel one, and the theme requires abler efforts than, I fear, I can bring to the discharge of it. It is therefore with great distrust I attempt to approach it. An assemblage of this sort, and upon such an occasion, is not only new, but unprecedented in our section of country. But, notwithstanding its novelty, what can be more justifiable, or more interesting than to witness a large assemblage of relatives and friends, called together by the venerable head of his family association, to pay homage to the great worth of a departed ancestor, who, when living, stood pre-eminently at its head? It is an effort, although a feeble one, to arrest from oblivion the recollection of one, whose memory is fast fading away, and ere long will be forgotten, because all who knew him will soon have passed by and be forgotten also.

*This address was delivered by the late Colonel John D. Hawkins, at a family reunion in Warren County on September 28, 1829. Together with above preamble it was published in pamphlet form in 1829. Pamphlet was republished in 1906 by Dr. A. B. Hawkins, of Raleigh, a son of John D. Hawkins.

To hold up to view the successful enterprise, the patriotism and the virtues of the departed dead, is the province of biography, which acts as a mirror to reflect upon the living, examples of wisdom and of worth, from whence may be derived the most salutary lessons. If biography in general produces these conceded results, its benign influence will operate in an increased ratio upon relatives, when contemplating the enviable character of a departed and beloved ancestor.

Col. Philemon Hawkins, senior, deceased, was born on the 28th of September, 1717, on Chickahominy river, near Todd's bridge in Charles City county and State of Virginia, this day 112 years ago. He was the oldest child of his parents, Philemon and Ann, and his father died when he was of tender years, leaving three children, Philemon, John and Ann. Although Philemon the elder died, leaving to his children a scanty patrimony, he seemed to have entertained peculiar notions of predilection in regard to them. He felt towards them an unusual confidence; for, by his will, he desired that they should come to the control of their patrimony at the age of 18 years; and this confidence, as regarded the subject of this memoir, was not misplaced.

The widowed mother Ann afterwards intermarried with a native of Ireland; and by the time her son Philemon had reached the appointed age of 18, his celebrity for industry and manly deportment excelled all his associates, even those of riper years, and was of extensive circulation, a sure prognostic that he would rise above his then condition. Col. Lightfoot, of Williamsburg, a gentleman of great wealth and discernment, had three plantations in Charles City county and the fame of our then youthful ancestor had reached him, though he lived 60 miles distant, and had deeply impressed him with a desire to place these three estates under his youthful control. He sent for him to come to Williamsburg, and on getting there, they made a contract, the stipulations of which showed at once the confidence of the employer and the great reputation for good management and great ability in the employed. But his mother was unhappily married. It was her misfortune not to find in her husband that conjugal tenderness, affection and forbearance, which the wedded estate should assure to those who enter into it. The ill treatment of her husband had rendered the protection of her son Philemon necessary to her safety. And her husband's embarrassments and difficulties had fixed in him a determined resolution to remove to North Carolina. This was a trying time for the mother. To accompany her husband she was compelled to do; but to leave her son would bereave her of that protection which had not only stayed the arm of cruelty, but was further necessary to aid her with the necessaries of life, and to dispel the sad gloom of a cheerless fireside. She entreated her son to accompany her, and he pleaded his engagement, and the necessity he was under honorably to fulfil it. Under these distressing and conflicting embarrassments, the unhappy mother repaired to Williamsburg to entreat Col. Lightfoot to let her son off from his bargain, that he might accompany her to North Carolina. When she named the subject to him, he peremptorily refused to let him off, saying, although he was but a boy, he had long desired his services and the pay he was to give him was ample; and that he should not only injure himself, but her son, by letting him off from the contract. With this mortifying and most distressing rebuff the distracted mother retired to a neighboring place to spend the night, having been unwilling to expose to Col. Lightfoot's views the secret motives which so much prompted her to desire the company of her son. There melancholy, with all its accompaniments of distress, harrowed up her soul, and she resolved to try Col. Lightfoot once more, though mortifying, to tell him the cause of her importunities. She gained his presence the next morning, and found upon his brow that peculiar look, which indicated unwillingness to hear any more from her upon the subject of her errand. But she entreated him to listen to her motives, and unfolded to him her situation; that although her son was but a boy, he was her gallant protector and defender. This changed the scene. Col. Lightfoot, as a man of chivalry, could not permit his interest to weigh against a woman's safety and a mother's safety too, when that was to be secured by the presence of her son. He instantly said, "Go madam, and take your son. His great worth had caused me to desire much his management of my business; but your need is entitled to the preference; and those rare qualities and powers, which he possesses, and which had gained him my confidence and esteem, will ensure your protection."

Philemon, together with his brother John and his sister Ann, accompanied his mother and her husband to North Carolina, and they settled upon Six Pound creek, then Edgecombe, now Warren county. Nearly the whole country was then a wilderness inhabited by Indians and the wild beasts of the forest. This country was then called a frontier, where civilization had shed abroad but little of its influence, and where the first settlers had to share, in a great degree, the privations which attended the first settlers of these United States. Persecution conduced to the first settlements of America, and that though of a different sort, fixed the destiny of this branch of the Hawkins family in this country.

There were other branches from the Charles City stock, which migrated to other parts of the Union; one went to the State of Kentucky, which produced Joseph Hawkins, formerly a member of Congress from Kentucky, and who afterwards died in New Orleans. That gentleman traced his connexion with our family in a conversation with our distinguished and venerable fellow citizen Nathaniel Macon, Esq., who now contributes by his presence to commemorate this occasion, and this day.

This branch of the family came here headed by Philemon, who was but a youth a little turned 18 years of age, poor in purse, but rich in spirit. By the sweat of his brow he sustained his mother, his sister and his brother with all the comforts their wants required. He cheered the drooping spirits of his mother, and, by every effort in his power, contributed to her wants and her wishes. His filial affection is recounted the more willingly, because it is a virtue he not only practiced, but because his course was such as to inspire his descendants with his kindred spirit; and it is that spirit which gave rise to this assemblage, and it is one of the manifold evidences of its analogy to the parental stock which gave it birth. May its influence descend to the remotest family generation in parallel with this laudable example!

In the year 1743, he intermarried with Delia Martin, the daughter of Zachariah Martin, Esq., who lived in an upper county of Virginia. But she lived with her brother, Capt. John Martin, on Sandy Creek, then Edgecombe, now Franklin county. They were married in Virginia at a church in the county of Brunswick, by Parson Beatty. By her he had Fannie, who intermarried with Maj. Leonard Bullock, Col. John Hawkins, Col. Philemon Hawkins, Col. Benjamin Hawkins, late Superintendent of Indian affairs, Col. Joseph Hawkins of the Continental army, and Ann, who intermarried with Micajah Thomas, Esq. All of whom have long since passed to the tomb, except our venerable host Col. Philemon Hawkins who is also the only survivor of the signers of the Constitution of North Carolina ratified in the year 1776; and whose laudable desire to see all together the descendants of his worthy father, as well as his collateral kindred, has invited us here this day that his history may be told over, to excite us to inculcate his virtues, and to profit by his examples, at the same time we attempt to do honor to his memory.

Our worthy ancestors lived at the mouth of Six Pound creek on Roanoke river, about ten years. They then removed to this tract of land, and not many years afterwards to this place, which was then in the county of Edgecombe. The province of North Carolina was divided at an early period of our history as suited the then Lords Proprietors, and their government, into eight precincts, as they were called, to wit: Beaufort, Carteret, Chowan, Craven, Currituck, Hyde, Perquimans and Pasquotank, to which Bertie precinct was afterwards added, by a division of Chowan. These precincts embraced the whole province and were afterwards called counties, and were divided and sub-divided and other counties erected as the population extended and the reasons and necessities of the province developed themselves. The first settlements were made upon the seashore and they extended westwardly, as they increased. The metes and bounds of these counties or precincts were but little known, and, owing to the savage inhabitants of the country, their geography could not be better ascertained at that time. Legislative acts were frequently resorted to, to settle occurring disputes about boundary and to form new counties, where the interest of the inhabitants required them. This section of country, as well as I can now ascertain it, was comprehended within Beaufort precinct, and Edgecombe county spread largely within its limits. From Edgecombe the county of Granville was taken in the year 1746, and the dividing line began at the mouth of Stone House creek, on Roanoke river. Thence to the mouth of Cypress swamp, on Tar river and from thence across the river in a direct course to the middle ground between Tar river and Neuse river, being the dividing line between Edgecombe and Craven counties. The uncertainty of this latter line now forms the subject matter of an unsettled dispute as to boundary between the counties of Wake and Franklin. In 1764, the county of Bute was taken from the county of Granville; and in 1779 the county of Bute was divided into the counties of Warren and Franklin.

I have been thus circumstantial in the detail of the change and formation of counties, because our ancestor figured in many of them, living the greater part of the time at the same place. In the year 1757 he was elected High Sheriff of Granville county, which then consisted of what Granville now is, added to all Franklin, and all that part of Warren lying to the south of Roanoke river. In this extensive country, where civilization was far from being complete, and where the arm of the law was weakened by an habitual insubordination, great energy of mind as well as personal bravery was required to perform the duties of sheriff. These qualities he possessed in an eminent degree; and when his deputies were overpowered, as was sometimes the case, by those who threw off the restraints of the law, he repaired at once to the scene of action, and, even when threatened to be mobbed would personally attack the leader, having the address at the same time to win over his followers to a more correct course. This once occurred in the Little river settlement now in the county of Franklin, where one Bud Kade headed a mob to avoid paying taxes. And in the year 1759 when Robin Jones was considered the most eminent lawyer in this country, many of the suitors in Granville court, whose misfortune it was not to get him on their side, lost their causes, as they supposed, by his superior knowledge, and they fixed the determination to drive him by violence from the court. A threat to this effect, it was hoped, would deter him from attending the court; but Mr. Jones was not thus to be alarmed. He felt that he was shielded by his duty to his clients and the laws of the country; and that if the deputies could not enforce subordination, he relied upon the High Sheriff. To that end, he privately advised the High Sheriff of the machinations planning, and solicited his personal attention early at court, prepared for events, and to keep order. Accordingly the High Sheriff attended court at an early hour, armed to meet any occurrence. Robin Jones informed the court of the danger which threatened him, urging at the same time that he was an officer of the court, and entitled to its protection. The court ordered the sheriff to keep out of the court house all persons disposed to produce a riot. Thus protected by the constituted authorities, and firmly supported by his own inclination, he met at the courthouse door the ringleaders, and some of them were bold and conspicuous characters; for among them was Col. Benton, the grandfather of Col. Thomas H. Benton, the present Senator from Missouri, who felt himself aggrieved and justified in the course he took. The threatening rioters assembled at the courthouse door, armed and made a show to enter; but were prevented by the determined spirit of the High Sheriff whose look, with arms in his hands, was too convincing that the entrance would be too costly; and, therefore, they desisted from their purpose and dispersed.

The construction of the government which existed at this period of our history was one of such discordance between the governors and the governed, that that moral force which is essential to its well being, and to the comenting together of all its parts, did not exist. The idea of subjection to a foreign yoke, of a tributary obligation, even of the mildest form, is repugnant to the choice; and although the idea might not at that time have been entertained to throw it off, yet a restlessness and a dissatisfaction prevailed and a slight matter was calculated to produce a popular ferment. We can trace this jealous discontented spirit through our history for a long time before it broke out in the Revolution which cured us of that grievous disquietude. It was that disquietude, but more systematically kept up, which had increased to an unprecedented height, and caused the Regulators to assemble in the year 1771 and which ended in the battle of the Alamance on the 16th day of May of that year. Gov. Tryon, the then Governor of the colony of North Carolina, resided at New Bern and finding that the Regulators were trampling down everything like government, and, if not resisted, would throw the whole country into anarchy and misrule, and being by education a military man, and of great personal bravery, he resolved to march against them, and called to his assistance a considerable military force. He at the same time called to his assistance as many of the most respectable citizens of the colony as he could, thereby calculating to add to his military the moral force of the country. His assemblage on this occasion was large. It contained many of the first characters of the colony and it had, as was expected, the calculated imposing effect. The number on the side of the Regulators was the largest; but they lacked discipline or unity of action. Upon this occasion his Excellency selected our venerated ancestor as his chief Aid-de-Camp and assigned to him the hazardous duty to read to the Regulators his Proclamation, which he did promptly. And after the battle commenced, he was the bearer of the Governor's commands throughout the whole action. This so exposed him to the fire of the enemy, that his hat was pierced by two balls, various balls passed through his clothes, and one bullet and two buck shot lodged in the breech of his gun, which he carried and used during the action. But he had the good fortune not to be wounded. After the battle was over, he was complimented by the Governor for the very efficient aid he gave him, and for the bravery and ability he displayed during the engagement.

The spirit of dissatisfaction, which had so often manifested itself, although apparently quieted for the time, continued to increase until it burst in open opposition to the British Government, about four years after the battle of the Alemance, and terminated in the establishment of the independence of the United States. It is a little remarkable that during his arduous struggle for our independence, those who had been found, during minor conflicts, arrayed against the government and laws, were never found acting conspicuously in support of it. On the contrary, many of them were Tories; and those who fought bravely under the banners of George III, against the Regulators, were, during that great struggle, the true Whigs of the country. The reason for this difference seems to have arisen from the circumstance that many of the Regulators were enemies to good order and to government generally, and for these causes were unwilling to unite in any systematic efforts to shake off the British yoke.

During this great struggle for American liberty, our ancestor being three score years old, did not render himself conspicuous in a military point of view, except by pushing forward his sons in aid of the good cause, by supplying them with all the money and other means which they required for that purpose. But he was offered the command of a Brigadier General, which he declined, preferring to act in a civil capacity. Although he was thus old, he had the industry, activity and enterprise of a younger man, and preferred that his sons should go forth in personal defence of the country, while he stayed at home and made and supplied them with the necessary funds; and this he did largely, as occasions required them, feeling and acting for the good cause more efficiently than he could have done in the field. But after the adoption of the Constitution in 1776, and upon the election of Richard Caswell, who was the first Governor of the State of North Carolina, he was elected by the General Assembly one of the Counsel of State; which station he filled for some time, not only with Governor Caswell, but subsequently with Governor Alexander Martin.

Col. Philemon Hawkins, our ancestor, was a man about five feet nine inches high, very compactly built, and, when in vigorous health, weighed about one hundred and fifty-eight pounds. He possessed uncommon muscular powers and bodily activity, and a strength of constitution, which enabled him to bear fatigue and fitted him for hardships. His early education had been scanty, owing to his poverty and the loss of his father; but his natural mind was vigorous and comprehensive, well fitting and qualifying him for correct judgment, for which he was conspicuous. This made him seem to be correct by intuition; although he would make very logical deductions, showing at the same time the possession of strong reasoning powers. His buoyant and enterprising spirit always kept him one of the first men of his time. This, added to his extensive business, gave him the great knowledge of men and things, which he so eminently possessed, and were the great sources of his general intelligence. Not having had the benefit of a more early and liberal education, and feeling great need of it, and particularly for its concomitants, good language and the free use of words, he resolved at a very early period to acquire the means, and to give his sons good educations. He soon obtained by his assiduity the money, but the patrons of literature were so few, and seminaries of learning so scarce, that there was not a classical school in all this country to which he could send his two first sons, Col. John and Col. Philemon Hawkins. Under such circumstances, he concluded to send them to Scotland, under the protection of a friend; but Col. John Hawkins was so nearly grown, and unwilling to go, that the idea was abandoned. When Col. Benjamin and Col. Joseph Hawkins arrived at the proper ages, he sent them to Princeton College, which seminary was at that time, owing to the great want of intercourse, such as is now in use, by stages and steamboats, almost as difficult of access as many of the European colleges. They continued at Princeton, progressing regularly in their collegiate course, and were only prevented from receiving the honors of the college by the war of the Revolution, which waxed warm at Princeton, and in the Jerseys, and suspended the business of that institution.

From the end of the Revolutionary war to the time of his death, our venerated ancestor gave his attention mainly to the pursuits of private life. He was a Justice of the Peace from an early period, as long as he lived, and was a valuable member of the Court of his county. His favorite pursuits from early life, were raising stock, cropping, and the pursuit of some regular profitable business; and, by a steady application to them all, he acquired great wealth. At the opening of the land office under the present government, having the ability, he became largely interested in taking up and acquiring lands, as well as all other property; he became entangled in many legal difficulties growing out of the state of the country and the speculations consequent upon a change of its policy. This new business, calling into action his superior judgment, showed him to possess an adaptation for it; for he uniformly prevailed. This latter business, and his often seeking distant markets for what he had to sell, added to his previous very extensive acquaintance, rendered him one of the most noted men in this country; and, what was calculated to keep up his notoriety, his was a house of unbounded hospitality. It was always open to administer to the comforts of all. And here I may be permitted to say, that no man ever had a helpmate, whose general good sense, good management, and superior domestic economy, exceeded that of Mrs. Delia Hawkins, the wife of Col. Philemon Hawkins, sen'r, deceased. They were both poor originally, and had to resort to all the drudgery of labor attending that condition in life. But, by their good conduct and superior good sense, the scene was soon changed, and as they travelled on through life, increasing in wealth, they also increased in respectability and refinement, till at length their house—this house—was the resort of the fashionable and the gay, the man of business and the literati of the country. All found here a plentiful, an elegant, and a sumptuous repast. Although Col. Philemon Hawkins was not himself a man of science, his sons Benjamin and Joseph were, and they lived here with their parents, and added a zest to all that was agreeable. The style and fashion of the place was noted and exemplary, and the resort to it from many parts of the world considerable. During the French Revolution in 1792, there were many men of note from France, who resorted here to enjoy the great pleasure of conversing in their own language, which Col. Benjamin Hawkins, from his classical knowledge of it, was enabled to afford them.

Col. Philemon Hawkins, sen'r, deceased, lived up to the maxim, that extended hospitality, properly conducted, did not conflict hurtfully with the true rule of domestic economy; that the additional supply to be laid in for that object, only required an additional effort to procure it, which the company of friends always doubly paid him for. So that he set down these few additional efforts as better and more agreeably requited than those bestowed for the sake of money alone. And as the human character seems generally to be better satisfied, and more regaled by variety, it might be permitted to weigh this maxim and see if its analysis proves its correctness. He pursued the rule of being generally employed in some useful business, or to some useful purpose, and by way of innovating upon its monotony, he would put forth his additional efforts to the cause of hospitality, by way of change, and agreeable relaxation in the same pursuit. By this means, though the pursuit be the same, the object aimed at was different, and that constituted the pleasurable variety. For the variety sought for, is to the sense, and if the same pursuit produces it, which in every other respect is useful, it is more than safe to rely upon this maxim. If this, then, is a logical deduction, in a money making sense, and so it may be by keeping off worse pursuits, it surely should not be departed from. And to the pleasure and reciprocal advantage afforded by the practice of hospitality, is to be added the sum of advantage to those upon whom it is bestowed.

This house, once animated by the presence of our venerated ancestors, and once the seat of pleasure, of grandeur and of science, has undergone by the work of time a great change; and what is there upon which time will not leave its stamp? For many years it has been almost deserted, and for a long time in a state of dilapidation; and could the spirit of the dead look back upon that earthly tabernacle which was occupied in life, surely the spectacle to our ancestors must have presented a sad contrast. But the day of resurrection for this spacious old mansion is at hand. Our venerable host has decreed it to be so. Ere long the extensive repairs already begun, and which are far advanced, will be completed, when it will present again its ancient appearance, somewhat modified, and somewhat improved. And one great incentive to this work arises from the holy feeling of reverential regard for its ancient owners; and that appearances should be revived here as a tribute to their memory. The example thus set of reverence to parents, if followed, will never fail to enkindle and to keep alive those finer feelings of the soul, which ennoble our character and our nature, and have been valued in all ages as virtuous testimony of grateful benevolence. History records it as great virtue in Epaminondas, that in the celebrated Battle of Leuctra, where he gained unfading laurels as a general, upon being felicitated for the renown he had won, he showed his greatest pleasure consisted in the pleasure his parents would enjoy at his victory.

This day one hundred and twelve years ago, Col. Philemon Hawkins, sen., deceased, was born, and he died on the 10th day of September, 1801, having lived nearly eighty-four years. He has now been dead upwards of twenty-eight years, and notwithstanding the long time which has rolled on since his death, his appearance is still fresh in the recollection of many of us; and his manly perseverance, his steady habits of useful industry, his systematic arrangement of his business and his time, his contempt for idleness and dissipation, will, it is earnestly hoped, never be forgotten by us. He was a great friend to schools. Not having had himself the benefits of a liberal, scientific education, but possessing in an eminent degree all that practical good sense which could estimate the worth of it, he was their liberal patron. He was a strong advocate for internal improvements. His comprehensive mind pioneered him through the ways which are now followed, though slowly, to advance the best interests of the country in the way of its improvement. He had himself struggled through the wilderness, had seen the face of the country gradually improve, and he regretted much that all his influence could achieve was to open new roads, from whence great benefit was derived.

When we take a review of his rise and progress in life, and contrast them with the idleness and dissipation of the present day, we are ready to exclaim, that degeneracy is surely among us. He lived within his income, and caused it continually to increase; by which he was not only increasing his ability to live, but to increase his fortune, and to add to his power to be useful. Accustomed to labor in early life, laudable industry was viewed by him as a great virtue, and as the road to honor and usefulness; and he who practiced it, was much exalted in his estimation. He always looked back to the days of his early life with pleasing reminiscences, and the most grateful feeling to the Giver of all good for having inspired him with the resolution, and given him the ability and the aptitude for labor and industrious enterprise, by which he had been able to throw off the shackles of poverty, and to acquire an ample fortune to raise and to sustain his family and himself in his old age. If a similar course was now pursued, much happier indeed would be the condition of this country. Let us then emulate his virtues, and inculcate his habits, and instill into the minds of our children the examples of his prosperous and useful life; and when each rolling year shall bring around the day of his birth, let us hail it as his natal day, and endeavor to imprint it deeper and deeper in their hearts.

George Washington in Guilford

By J. A. Hoskins

There has been a discussion going on regarding distinguished personages whose history is connected with Guilford county. It has been shown that the wife of our fourth President was born at New Garden (Guilford College); that our seventh President had been a resident of our county and a member of our bar. We now come to the greatest of them all, our first president, the immortal George Washington. His history is indisputably linked with that of Guilford. He was entertained at Guilford courthouse (Martinsville) June 2 and 3, 1791, by Governor Alexander Martin, on his southern tour, and visited the scenes of the great conflict between our own General Greene and General Lord Cornwallis. I am here presenting his Journal from June 2 to June 27. This is the first appearance of this part of Washington's diary of his southern tour. It has long been a moot point as to whether Governor Martin entertained President Washington, at Guilford courthouse, or at Danbury, his plantation on the Dan in Rockingham county. The tax returns show. Governor Martin had a home in Martinsville late as 1806. The diary sets the matter straight. Judge Douglas, in his address at Guilford Battleground celebration, and which is in booklet form, was in error in saying that this historical event took place "at Danbury." Mr. Frank Nash in his admirable paper on Governor Martin follows Judge Douglas in this matter. It is true that "Alexander Martin, Go" was enumerated in the first federal census, 1790, in Rockingham county. This is shown by the volume of Colonial and State Records, containing the first census. He had also a home in Martinsville, and there he did the honors. Judge Douglas was, no doubt, relying on the first census. His address is a splendid effort and throws much light on the life and times of Governor Martin.

The copies I have of the Diary, Southern Tour, are photostat copies of the original note book in Washington's own handwriting, obtained from the Library of Congress.

From the record in Washington's own writing I quote: (note book).

"Thursday, June 2, 1791.

"In company with the Governor I set out by four o'clock for Guilford, breakfasted at one Dobsons, at the distance of eleven miles from Salem and dined at Guilford, sixteen miles farther, where there was a considerable gathering of people who had received notice of my intention to be there today, and came to satisfy their curiosity. On my way I examined the ground on which the action between General Greene and Lord Cornwallis commenced, and after dinner rode over that where their lines were formed and the score closed in the retreat of the American forces. The first line of which was advantageously drawn up and had the troops done their duty properly the British must have been sorely galded in ye advance, if not defeated. The lands between Salem and Guilford are in places very fine but upon the whole cannot be called more than middling, some very bad. On my approach to this place (Guilford) I was met by a party of light horse which I prevailed on the Governor to dismiss and to countermand his orders for others to attend me through the State.

"Friday, 3.

"Took my leave of the Governor, whose intention was to have attended me to the line, but for my request that he would not, and about four o'clock I proceeded on my journey, breakfasted at Troublesome Iron Works, called fifteen but at least is seventeen miles from Guilford, partly in the Rain and, from my information, or for want of it, was obliged to travel twelve miles further than I intended today, to one Gatewood's within two miles of Dix' Ferry over the Dan, at least thirty miles from the Iron works. The land over which I passed this day were of various qualities and as I approached the Dan, were a good deal covered with pine. In conversing with the Governor, on the state of politics in North Carolina I learned with pleasure that opposition to the general government and the discontent of the people were subsiding fast and that he should so soon as he received the laws which he had written to the Secretary of State for, issue his proclamation requiring all officers and members of the Government to take the oaths prescribed by law. He seems to condemn the speculation in lands and the purchases from the State of Georgia, and thinks, as every sensible and disinterested man must, that schemes of that sort must involve the country in trouble, perhaps in blood.

"Saturday, 4.

"Left Mr. Gatewood's about half after six o'clock and between his house and the Ferry passed the line which divides the State of Virginia and North Carolina and dining at one Wilson's, sixteen miles from the Ferry, lodged at Halifax Old Town.

"The road from Dix' Ferry to Wilson's passes over very hilly (and for the most part) indifferent land being a good deal mixed with pine though it is said here that pine when mixed with oak and more especially with hickory is not indicative of a poor soil. From Wilson's to Halifax Old Town the soil is good and of a reddish cast. Having this day passed the line of North Carolina and, of course, finished my tour thro' the three southernmost states, a general discription of them may be comprised in the following few words. From the Seaboard to the falls of all the rivers, which water the lands, except the swamps on the rivers and the lesser streams which empty into them and the interval lands higher up the rivers is with but few exceptions neither more nor less than a continued pine barren, very thinly inhabited. The part next the Seaboard for many miles is a dead level and badly watered. That above it is hilly and not much better than barrens, if possible less valuable on account of its hills and because they are more inconvenient to market, supposing them capable as the lands below, of producing beef, pork, tar, pitch and turpentine. The lands above the falls of the several rivers from information, and as far as my own observation has extended, is of a very superior kind, from their being of a greasy red with large oaks intermixed with hickory, chestnut, etc., excelling in producing corn, tobacco, wheat, hemp and other articles in great abundance and are generally thickly inhabited, comparatively speaking with those below.

"In the lower country (near the Seaboard) in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, rice as far up as the swamps extend is almost the sole article that is raised for market, some of the planters of which grow as much corn as with the sweet potatoes, support their people. The middle country, that is between the rice lands and the falls of the rivers, and a little above them, is cultivated chiefly in corn and indigo and the upper country in tobacco, corn, hemp, and in some degree the smaller grains. It is nearly the same in North Carolina with this difference, however, that as not much rice is planted there, especially in the northern part of the State, corn, some indigo, with naval stores and pork, are substituted in its place, but as indigo is on the decline, hemp, cotton, etc., are grown in its place. The inland navigation of the rivers of these three States may be improved according to the ideas I have formed of the matter to a very extensive degree to great and useful purposes and at a very moderate expense, compared with the vast utility of the measure inasmuch as the falls of most of them are trifling and their lengths are great, going to the markets penetrating the country in all directions by their lateral branches and in their present state (except at the falls which, as has been observed before, are trifling) navigable for vessels carrying several hogsheads of tobacco or other articles in proportion. The prices at which rice lands in the lower parts of the States are held is very great. Those of which, if have been improved, from twenty pounds to thirty pounds sterling and, fifty pounds has been given for some, and from ten pounds to fifteen pounds is the price of it in its rude state. The pine barrens adjoining these sell from $1 to $2 per acre, according to circumstances.

"The interval lands on the rivers below the falls and above the rice swamps also command a good price but not equal to those above and the pine barrens less than those below. The lands of the upper country sell from four to six or seven dollars, according to the quality and circumstances thereof. In the upper parts of North Carolina wheat is pretty much grown and the farmers seem disposed to try hemp but the land carriage is a considerable drawback having between 200 and 300 miles to carry the produce either to Charlestown, Petersburg, or Wilmington, which are their three great marts, though of late Fayetteville receives a good deal of the bulky articles, and they are water borne from thence to Wilmington. Excepting the towns and some gentlemen's seats along the road from Charlestown to Savannah there is not within view of the whole road I traveled, from Petersburg to this place, a single house which has anything of an elegant appearance. They are altogether of wood, and chiefly of logs, some indeed have brick chimneys but generally the chimneys are of split sticks, filled with dirt between them. The accommodations on the whole road, except in the towns and near there, as I was informed, for I had no opportunity of judging, lodging having been provided for me in them (at my own expense) were found extremely indifferent, the houses being small and badly provided either for man or horse tho extra exertions when it was known I was coming, which was generally the case, were made to receive me. It is not easy to say which road, the one I went or the one I came, the entertainment is most indifferent, but with truth it may be added, of course, that both are bad, and is to be accounted for from the kind of travelers which use them, which, with a few exceptions only, on the upper road, are no other than wagoners and families removing, who generally take their provisions along with them. The people, however, appear to have abundant means to live well. The grounds, where they are settled, yielding grain in abundance and the natural herbage a multitude of meat with little or no labor to provide food for the support of their stock, especially in Georgia where it is said the cattle live thru the winter without any support from the owners of them. The manners of the people, as far as my observation, and means of information extended, were orderly and civil and they appeared to be happy, contented and satisfied with the general Government, under which they were placed. Where the case was otherwise, it was not difficult to trace the cause to some demi-gogue or speculating character. In Georgia, the dissatisfied part of them, at the late treaty with the creek Indians were evidently land jobbers who strangled every principle of justice to the Indians and policy to their country, would, for their own immediate emolument strip the Indians of all their territory, if they could obtain the least countenance to the measure, but it is to be hoped the good sense of the state will set its face against such diabolical attempts and is also to be wished and by many it was said it might be expected that the sales by that state to what are called the Yazoo Companies would fall thru. The discontents which it was supposed the last Revenue Act (commonly known by the Excise Law) would create, subside as fast as the law is explained and little was said of the Banking act.

"Sunday, 5th.—Left the Old Town about four o'clock a.m., and breakfasted at one Pridies' (after crossing Bannister River one and a half miles) about eleven miles from it, came to Stanton River, about twelve, where meeting Col. Isaac Coles (formerly a member of Congress for this district) and who pressing me to it, I went to his house, about one mile off to dine and to halt a day for the refreshment of myself and horses, leaving my servants and them at one of the usually indifferent taverns at the Ferry that they might be no trouble or be inconvenient to a private family.

"Monday 6th.

"Finding my horses fared badly at the Ferry for want of grass and Col. Coles kindly pressing me they were accordingly brought there to take the run of it until night. Dined with the gentleman today also. The road from Halifax Old Courthouse or Town to Stanton River, passes for the most part over this land, a good deal mixed with pine.

"Tuesday, 7th.

"Left Col. Coles by daybreak and breakfasted at Charlotte C. H., 15 miles, where I was detained some time to get shoes put on such horses as had lost them, proceeded afterwards to Prince Edward C. H., 20 miles further. The lands from Stanton Ferry to Charlotte, C. H. are generally good and pretty thickly settled. They are cultivated chiefly in tobacco, wheat and corn with oats and flax. The houses, tho none elegant, are generally decent and bespeak good livers, being for the most part weatherboarded and shingled, with brick chimneys, but from Charlotte, C. H. to Prince Edward, C. H., the lands are of an inferior quality with few inhabitants in sight of the road. It is said they are thickly settled off it. The roads by keeping the ridges pass on the most indifferent ground.

"Wednesday, the 8th.

"Left Prince Edward, C. H., as soon as it was well light, and breakfasted at one Treadway's, 13 miles off, dined at Cumberland, C. H., 14 miles further, and lodged at Moore's Tavern, within 2 miles from Carter's Ferry, over James River. The road from Prince Edward, C. H., to Treadway's was very thickly settled, altho the land appeared thin and the growth is a great degree pine, and from Treadway's to Cumberland, C. H., they were equally thickly settled, on better land, less mixed, and in places not mixed with pine. The buildings appeared to be better.

"Thursday, 9th.

"Set off very early from Moore's, but the proper ferry being hauled up, we were a tedious while crossing in one of the boats used in the navigation of the river, being obliged to carry one carriage at a time, without horses and crossways the boat, on planks. Breakfasted at a Widow Pains', 17 miles on the north side of the river, and lodged at a Mr. Jordans, a private house, where we were kindly entertained and to which we were driven by necessity by having rode not less than 25 miles from our breakfasting stop thru very bad roads in a very sultry day without any rest and by missing the right road had got lost. From the river to the Widow Pains' and thence to Anderson's Bridge, over the North Anna Branch of the Pamunke the lands are not good nor thickly settled on the road, nor does the soil or growth promise much (except in places) from thence for several miles further, but afterwards thru the county of Louisa, which is entered after passing the bridge, the river over which it is made, dividing it from Goochland they are much better and continued so with little exception quite to Mr. Jordan's.

"Friday, 10th.

"Left Mr. Jordan's early and breakfasted at one Johnson's, 7 miles off. Reached Fredericksburg, after another (short) halt, about 3 o'clock, and dined and lodged at my sister Lewis'. The lands from Mr. Jordan's to Johnson's and from thence for several miles further are good but not rich afterwards. As you approach nearer the Rappahannock River they appear to be of a thinner quality and more inclined to Black Jacks.

"Saturday, 11th.

"After dinner with several gentlemen, whom my sister had invited to dine with me I crossed the Rappanhannock and proceeded to Stafford C. H., where I lodged.

"Sunday, 12th.

"About sunrise we were off, breakfasted at Dumfrees and arrived at Mt. Vernon to dinner. From Monday, the 13th, until Monday, the 27th, (being the day I had appointed to meet the Commissioners under the Residence Act, at Georgetown) I remained at home, and spent my time in daily rides to my several farms and in receiving many visits.

"Monday, 27th.

"Left Mt. Vernon for Georgetown before six o'clock, and, according to appointment met the Commissioners at the place by nine, then calling together the proprietors of the lands, on which the Federal City was proposed to be built, who had agreed to cede them on certain conditions, at the last meeting, I had with them, at this place."

The Most Distinguished Member of the Guilford Bar

By J. A. Hoskins

I have read with a great deal of pleasure the admirable address of welcome by Hon. George S. Bradshaw on the occasion of the meeting of the State Bar Association and was surprised at his omission of the name of Andrew Jackson, seventh President, from the long list of members of the Guilford bar, and again surprised that doubt should exist as to the authenticity of his Guilford residence and as to his being a former member of our bar. The old minute book of Pleas and Quarter Sessions in clerk's office, Greensboro, says: "Andrew Jackson produced a license from the judges of Superior Court of law and equity to practice law and was admitted an attorney of this court November, 1787." What has probably caused confusion is the fact that there was another Andrew Jackson in the county. The old minute book shows in 1798 Andrew Jackson attorney for William Bridges, acknowledged deed from Daniel Dawson for 74 acres. This was a power of attorney and the record so states. He was not a lawyer as has been erroneously claimed by some. This has been the stumbling block. It is clear that there was but one lawyer Andrew Jackson admitted to practice. Court record states in another place John Hamilton proved a power of attorney from William Bridges to Andrew Jackson empowering him to make title to David Dawson, Jr. In 1800 Andrew Jackson served as juryman. In 1801 Andrew Jackson was appointed road overseer. Andrew Jackson was appointed constable. In 1806 letters of administration on the estate of Andrew Jackson, deceased, were granted John Starrett and Edward Grau. It is clear that the record here refers to another Andrew Jackson who held the various small positions and died in 1806. The hero of the battle of New Orleans left Martinsville (Guilford courthouse) May, 1788, with Judge John McNairy to take up his duties as public prosecutor for the western district (Tennessee). Judge McNairy to assume the duties of Judge. They traveled on horseback. Parton says that "In the winter of 1784 and 1785 Andrew Jackson left his home in the Waxhaw settlement, S. C., and came to Salisbury, N. C., where for something over two years he studied law, at first in the office of Spruce McKay and afterwards in that of Colonel Stokes and that in November, 1787, he was licensed to practice law." (This latter date corresponds exactly with the record of minute book of Guilford court.)

Investigators, and there have been many, when finding the reference to "Andrew Jackson, attorney for William Bridges," in the year 1798 stopped there and asserted this was the attorney, Andrew Jackson, who was admitted to practice 1787.

He was born March 15, 1767, and was not quite 21 years of age. Parton states specifically that Jackson was for a short time in Martinsville. He was there evidently from November, 1787, to May, 1788, with his friend, Judge McNairy, and no doubt together they were preparing for their great work in Tennessee. This would make him a resident of Guilford county for six months and a member of Guilford bar. Sumner and Brown failed to make mention of his stay in Martinsville, otherwise agreeing with Parton as to the other facts, figures and dates. Parton is the great biographer of Jackson and he is corroborated by the court records of Guilford. This is the documentary proof. Now, for the traditionary. The writer of this distinctly remembers many years ago hearing the late W. S. Hill, Esquire, of Greensboro, often say that his father, Wilson Hill, knew Jackson when he resided in Martinsville, that he was a visitor in his father's home, that his father journeyed to Washington during the presidency of Jackson, that he called upon the President, and they talked over old times. Wilson Hill was a prominent citizen of this county, lived in good style at a place that is now called Scalesville in the north part of the county. The Hill place was afterwards known as the "Anselm-Reid Place." Again, Jackson was often a visitor in the home of Charles Bruce, of Bruce's Cross Roads (Summerfield). Stockard mentions this tradition. It is quite likely, for Bruce and Jackson were kindred spirits. They were both of Scotch descent. Bruce maintained a race track and a stud of racers.. He kept deer and fox hounds. He was a distinguished man and had served in the Halifax congress, as state senator, and a member of the county court and as its chairman, and afterwards other offices of honor and trust. He was intensely devoted to the cause of the Revolution, as was Jackson. Jackson at this time was a horse racing, cock fighting, rollicking young dare devil. He wrought well in his day and generation for the Republic.

Shall This General Assembly of North Carolina Ratify the 19th Amendment?*

By Hon. H. G. Connor, Jr.

In approaching a consideration of this resolution, and in discussing it, I shall confine myself, as nearly as may be, to two questions or propositions, which, briefly stated, are as follows:

1. Has this General Assembly at this time the moral or political right to ratify this amendment?

2. Conceding the first proposition, is it expedient that we do so?

In approaching a consideration of the first proposition, certain fundamental principles which lie at the very foundation of that system of Government which we inherited from those who founded it should be borne in mind.

We are reminded in the Declaration of Rights of the first Constitution adopted in this State, that of 1776, that the opening words thereof are:

(1) "That all political power is vested in and derived from, the people only.

(2) "That the people of this State ought to have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the Internal Government and Police thereof."

Again, in the Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of 1868, which is our present Constitution, we read: "That all political power is vested in, and derived from, the people; all Government of Right originates from the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole."

*This speech was delivered before the North Carolina Senate in August, 1920, when, under the superb leadership of Senator Lindsay Warren, the Rejectionists defeated the ratification of the proposed Nineteenth Amendment.

Again, we are told in this Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of 1868, "That the people of this State have the inherent, sole and exclusive right of regulating the Internal Government and Police thereof."

By whom was this Government founded? We are given the answer to this question in the Constitution of the United States and in the Constitution of North Carolina of 1776, and also in the Constitution of North Carolina of 1868. The Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of North Carolina of 1868, both open with "We, the people." The Constitution of 1776 opens thus: "The Constitution or form of Government agreed to and resolved upon by the representatives of the freemen of the State of North Carolina, elected and chosen for that particular purpose, in Congress assembled at Halifax, the 18th of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six."

To avoid any confusion of thought or understanding, let it be admitted at the outset that the words, "We, the people," in both the Federal Constitution and the State Constitution of 1868, and the word "freemen" used in the Constitution of 1776, mean one and the same thing; that is, they mean that portion of the people of North Carolina and the other States, who, under the laws of these States, at the time of the adoption of these Constitutions, were electors by the laws of the various States in which they lived. That is to say, the words, "We, the people," and "the freemen" mean "electors."

We are reminded by Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, that it was the people of the United States, and not the States, who adopted the Federal Constitution. We are all familiar with the historical fact that the convention at Philadelphia submitted the question of ratification, not to the Legislatures of the various States, but to conventions of the people of the various States called for that purpose. It has always been understood that constitutional conventions in the American system of government were the creation of the people, the electors of the various States in convention assembled, through their representatives. It is our nearest approach to pure democracy.

May I not then be permitted to say that it is a fundamental principle of American government, that the people, the electors and they only, founded this system, under which we live. As a corollary thereto, the people necessarily reserved unto themselves the right to alter or amend it, and never intended to delegate that power to any but representatives chosen by them for that particular purpose.

I, therefore, contend that my first proposition, that is, "Have we the moral or political right to ratify this amendment?" is the proposition involved, and not "Shall we or shall we not adopt Woman Suffrage?"

If all the political power is vested in, derived from, the people, and government of right originates from them, as the people of North Carolina have on the most solemn occasions of their political existence declared and reiterated, what right, political or moral, have we to take it from them, that is, to deprive them of a right which they have reserved unto themselves?

The people of North Carolina have been especially cautious in reserving unto themselves the right to amend, alter, change or otherwise deal with their fundamental law. The Constitution of 1776 contained no provision whatever for amendments or for any future constitution.

During the long agitation leading up to and culminating in the convention of 1835, there was never a suggestion, so far as I have been able to discover, that the Constitution could be changed, other than by a convention of the people. The Act under which the convention of '35 was called, provided that the question of "Convention" or "No convention" should first be voted upon by the people.

The convention of 1835 adopted a method of amending the Constitution, which is in effect the same method as is contained in the Constitution of 1868. A reading of the section, being section 2 of Article IV of the Amendments of '35, as well as a reading of Article 13 of the Constitution of '68, clearly demonstrates that the people reserved unto themselves the right to pass upon each and every amendment, and the right to pass upon the question of "Convention" or "No convention." No Legislature has ever sat in North Carolina which was authorized by the people of North Carolina to change by the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" their fundamental law. They have ever been jealous of this right. In the face of these conditions, we now hear it seriously contended that this Legislature shall arrogate to itself, without authority given unto it by the people, not to change the Constitution of North Carolina directly, but to change that which is over, above and superior to it, the Constitution of the United States, and not only change the Constitution of the United States, but change it in such a way that the State Constitution itself is changed without regard to the question whether the people of the State approve it or not. To put it more clearly, but not less truly, it is seriously proposed that eighty-seven members of this Legislature, all chosen since the submission of this amendment, shall take from the people of North Carolina, and I mean the electors, the power and privilege of passing upon the question of ratification or no ratification by electing representatives who would vote in accordance with their wishes. Twenty-six men in the Senate, sixty-one in the House, supposing a full attendance, eighty-seven in all, by voting for ratification, may change the Constitution of the United States and thereby the State Constitution, regardless of the will of the other two and a half million people in the State or that portion of the two and a half million who are the electors, without any opportunity for these people to express their will thereon. With a bare quorum in the Senate, fourteen men, and a bare quorum in the House, thirty-two men, forty-five in all, by arrogating and taking unto themselves this power, can forever take away from the people, their constituents, the power to pass upon this question. It is proposed that a majority of the present Senate and House, in a vital respect, without instructions from the people, without adopting any method of ascertaining their will in the matter, shall surrender a "right of regulating the Internal Government" of the State, a right which the Constitution we have sworn to support declares is a matter over which the people of the State have "the inherent, sole and exclusive control."

Seldom has it ever been suggested in a free country, that men who for the moment occupy particular offices shall exercise such autocratic power, or rather exercise power so autocratically, and it cannot be called by any other name, with any regard to the truth. Of course it should be needless to say that what the amendment accomplishes has nothing to do with the principle involved, but for the moment, permit me to repeat that this particular amendment does, in fact, take away from the people of the State of North Carolina, and from every other State in the Union, power which they now have. In language it confers nothing upon any one except upon Congress, but takes away from each and every State power which it not only now has, but which each and every State has always had since the foundation of this Government, and power which the people of North Carolina have repeatedly declared to be a matter of their "inherent, sole and exclusive" right to have and keep unto themselves.

I consider it a fundamental proposition, lying at the foundation of representative government, that no Legislature of this or any other State has the moral or political right to ratify an amendment which has been submitted by Congress, subsequent to the election of that particular Legislature. Any Legislature that does so in North Carolina, in my humble judgment, will suffer at the hands of the people when next the people are called upon to exert the residuum of power left in them.

The people of North Carolina were slow to ratify the Federal Constitution; they were slow to attempt to repeal the resolution of ratification in 1861. They are rather slow in moving politically, but when they do move, they are rather determined in their manner of moving. They have not given to this special session authority to change the State Constitution. They never intended to give it the right to change the Federal Constitution. I admit your power, but I decline to accede to your proposition that you have the right to do this thing.

At the risk of being tedious, I repeat: The control of the franchise is one of those "inherent, sole and exclusive" Internal Regulations which the people of North Carolina have declared again and again they propose to keep to themselves. This resolution of ratification proposes to surrender this to the United States Congress. It forever deprives the people of North Carolina of the power to pass upon this question themselves or by their instructed representatives. Not one of us was elected by the people to do this thing. We have no authority or commission from our constituents to act in the matter. We have neither the moral nor political right to act at all. We should await a mandate from the rulers, rather than obey one from their servants, chosen for an entirely different purpose.

Passing to the second proposition, that is, "Is it expedient that we ratify this amendment?" one of the questions which presents itself is, "why this sudden hurry?" We are told we will have the opportunity, the high honor, of conferring the suffrage upon all the women of the United States. I would state it rather in this way: That we may have the honor of taking away from every State in the Union the right to determine whether women shall vote within that State.

We are told that if we ratify that it will cause many women in States where they now have the privilege of voting to vote the Democratic ticket in November. Our Republican friends are told that their action in voting to ratify will cause many women in such States to vote the Republican ticket in November. We, the Democrats, are further told that if we refuse to ratify we will cause many women to vote the Republican ticket, and my Republican friends, on the contrary, are told that if they refuse to ratify, they will cause many women to vote the Democratic ticket. If we both vote to ratify, certainly all these results cannot be accomplished. Just how all these various, inconsistent, opposite and entangled results are to be accomplished is not explained and will not be, for they are incapable of explanation. The proposition that the women of Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Michigan, Montana, Nevada, New York, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming, the States in which they have full suffrage, will be influenced to vote in accordance with the action of the Democratic or Republican members of the Legislature of North Carolina, involves several fundamental errors.

One of these errors is that it is assumed that they will exercise their right of suffrage to reward or punish some party rather than exercise it for the purpose of assisting in solving the problems confronting the American people. I do not believe that the women of this country will be influenced by any such motive.

Assuming that women will exercise their right of suffrage where and when they have it to reward or punish, then it is further argued that suffrage is coming anyway, and that as a matter of expediency we should not stand in the way of its coming. Of course this is no valid argument, it is simply begging the question, but let us for a moment consider what lies at the bottom of this assumption.

There have always been those who attempt to calmly and coldly calculate the ultimate result and to act accordingly. This sort of thing has been by some called "getting on the winning side" and "getting on the band wagon." Men have played this game successfully and unsuccessfully, but seldom with honor. Admitting that this be the motive, men and women of honor never judge such persons by their success in guessing, but they go deeper and very properly dismiss both, the successful and the unsuccessful, with the word "trimmer."

If this be the only reason which can be advanced, I trust that I will be honored by those who would advance it by having them pass me by. Comparisons are said to be odious, but without meaning to be odious, let us for a moment pause. Does any one suppose that Washington, Henry, Jefferson, Harnett, Hooper, the Adamses and hosts of others in 1776, stopped to calculate the chances of success of the three million colonists in the struggle with the greatest empire then in existence? If so, then no sane man could or would have calculated in 1776 that this handful of people, scattered along 1,500 miles of sea coast, with nearly one-third of them opposed to the movement, had the slightest chance of winning. Such, however, was not the make-up of those who brought this Nation into life and wrote her Constitution.

Does any one suppose that Lee, the Johnsons, the ancestors of some of my colleagues, when called to defend their States from invasion, stopped to ask whether they were doomed to ultimate defeat? Certainly they did not, but they obeyed the call of the Constitution of their States and their people. Such was the make-up of those men.

Has it come to pass that the blood which ran through their veins has become so weakened in this generation that their sons and grandsons would calmly listen to this proposition without a blush of shame?

These words are not applicable to any one who conscientiously thinks that he has the moral right to vote for the ratification of this amendment and that ratification will redound to the benefit of his State and country.

We are also told that as it is bound to come, that the delay which may be occasioned by our refusal to ratify may change the election of a President. Well, are we to amend the Constitution every four years to capture a presidency? If that is the only way we can elect a President, we had best lose out. Did it ever occur to you that we might lose as many votes as we might gain? Neither is a reason for voting one way or the other upon this resolution, but there is as much danger in the one case as in the other. And, in passing, let me add: From my limited knowledge of the situation, speaking as a Democrat, we will stand an awfully good chance of losing very many votes if we ratify, and I think I know whereof I speak. We, as a party, will be held responsible, for we have the power and by its use shall we be judged.

Let's for a moment, however, consider what will be the effect of the passage of this resolution: Fifteen States have granted suffrage to women. We then have thirty-three States in which women do not vote. In these thirty-three, however, are included those in which they have Presidential suffrage.

If this resolution is passed by both Houses, then every woman in the United States will have the right to register and vote, if she can qualify under the election laws of her State. In those States in which they do not vote, there is not and cannot be any machinery or provision of law for the registration and voting of women. I do not see how it would be possible to avoid calling a special session of the General Assembly in the thirty-three States of the Union in which women do not have suffrage, in order that necessary laws providing machinery for the registration and voting of women in an election which is to be held within less than ninety days, be passed. If this is not done in each of the thirty-three States, then in the States in which it is not done there will of necessity, be chaos. Any man would be justified in refusing to act as a registrar or judge of election if this resolution is adopted and his State does not provide the machinery for the registration and voting of women. Suppose we were not in special session and this amendment were ratified by another State? How would it be possible for any registrar or judge of election in this State to determine what woman was entitled to register and vote and what not? Which of the various qualifications shall be applied to woman and which not? If she and her husband live separate and apart, where is her residence? It may be easy to answer these questions on the floor of this Senate, but how about on election day? There every registrar and poll holder must answer at his peril. An incorrect answer may mean imprisonment.

Can it be expedient that we calmly and deliberately do an act which will of necessity cause thirty-three States to have special sessions, thereby putting the taxpayers of those States to the enormous expense incident thereto? Would this be a sisterly act on our part?

But it is said that the State Convention and the National Convention have called upon us Democrats to do this thing; that the present President, a Democrat, is urging it, and that the nominee of both great parties are also urging it. The National Democratic Convention held in the city of San Francisco was called to deal with national matters. The present President was elected to deal with national matters. One of the two gentlemen from Ohio who are running for the Presidency, will have to deal with national matters when elected. Neither the convention nor either of these three gentlemen had anything to do with the Internal Regulations of this State. The people have reserved that unto themselves. I venture the assertion that this General Assembly is better qualified to deal with this question than either of the national candidates or the present incumbent. To be perfectly frank with you, these gentlemen are walking in where they have not been invited; they are uninvited counselors.

However, suppose we consider the State platform for a moment: No one has been elected under that platform and no one knows whether that platform will be approved by the people or not, and no one is bound by it.

I do know, however, that we Democrats were elected upon a platform adopted in St. Louis in 1916, in which it is said:

"We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the states upon the same terms as to men." You Republicans were elected upon a platform adopted in Chicago, which says: "The Republican party reaffirms its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of this country, favors the extension of suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself."

I congratulate my Republican friends upon their arrival at sound Democratic principles, for the planks in these two platforms are as sound Democratic doctrine as ever fell from the lips or pen of Thomas Jefferson, of Andrew Jackson, of Zebulon B. Vance, of Thomas J. Jarvis, of Alfred M. Scales, or of Charles B. Aycock. Upon that principle we Democrats have fought many political battles. It has been preached in every township in North Carolina, in every county, in every State in the Union.

North Carolina has been committed to it from its nativity. It is the foundation stone of local self government, for how can California or Maine have local self government when North Carolina dictates to either who shall vote in local elections?

Upon this principle thirteen States have granted suffrage to women. To this action on their part I have no complaint. I only want to refrain from taking that power from the other thirty-three, for such would be the effect of this amendment, if adopted, even though its adoption be for expediency's sake.

Shall we now depart from that principle? Shall we, for expediency's sake, join with those who for a half century have endeavored to take this right away from us?

I know not where others may stand, but as for me, I propose to stand by the teachings of my fathers in Democracy; to stand with Vance, Jarvis, Scales, Aycock and that great host who, leading the people of North Carolina, in their days of trial, preached, yes preached, this as the very keystone of the arch. I shall not today repudiate them. I shall stand with the people of Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, whose sons mingled their blood with the sons of this State, whose sons, under Lee and Jackson, shed their blood with our ancestors under Pettigrew and Hill, and Pender and Ramseur and Scales, upon many a bloody field from Bethel to Appomatox. In doing so I have the assurance, certainly of my own mind and conscience, that I am acting in obedience to the Constitution of North Carolina, the best traditions of her people, and obeying the dictates of sound, moral and political expediency, and this, I take it, is the measure and standard set by the fathers to the representatives of the people.

A Sketch of Fort Dobbs*

In Iredell county, upon an eminence about two miles north of the town of Statesville, stands a granite boulder which marks the site of old Fort Dobbs, that place of refuge to the early settlers, in the days when Cherokees and Catawbas roamed unmolested through the forests of North Carolina. The only remaining traces of the old fort are the marks of an excavation which show its location, and near by a depression overgrown with tangled clumps of bushes, said to be the site of the old well. Truly, it was an excellent site for a fort. That fact is still apparent even today, when it is but a quiet spot in the midst of cultivated fields, for from its walls the slopes of the seven hills, which surrounded it in the distance, could be plainly seen, and the approach of the enemy detected long before attack was made, while we can imagine that on many a night its light shone out for miles around, a beacon to guide the settlers, fleeing to safety within its walls.

On the first day of November, 1754, Arthur Dobbs, of County Antrim, Ireland, was made Governor of North Carolina to succeed Gabriel Johnston, who died in 1752. Governor Dobbs arrived during the French and Indian war, and finding the colony provided with very little means of defense, he immediately set to work to remedy this. He was especially interested in the western portion of the province, having himself received large grants of land between the Yadkin and Catawba rivers in 1745; and so in December, 1754, he persuaded the Assembly to vote money for the purpose of equipping a company of fifty men to defend the western frontier and assist in building a fort.

The news that a fort was to be built for their protection must have been very welcome indeed to the settlers in those troublous times, for they had been very much annoyed by the Indians. There is a record of a meeting between the settlers and the Catawba Indians, held at Salisbury August 29, 1754, at which numerous charges were brought against the Indians by the settlers. (Col. Rec., Vol. 5, p. 143.) These charges were answered by King Haglar of the Catawbas, who brought some counter charges against the white men and asked that no more strong drink be sold his warriors. This treaty was closed with protestations of friendship on both sides, and there was no further trouble until September 16th. On that date a massacre was committed by the Cherokees at the homes of John Gutrey and James Anshers, in which seventeen persons were killed and ten afterwards reported missing. A petition for aid having been sent to Matthew Rowan, president of the council, he sent supplies of powder and lead, and ordered Colonels Smith, of Rowan, and Clark, of Anson, to see to the welfare of the settlers and put the Catawba Indians on the trail of the murderers.

In June, 1755, Governor Dobbs made a journey to the western frontier for the purpose of selecting a site for the fort and inspecting his claim. Three companies of men, under the leadership of Captain Hugh Waddell, were sent ahead to scout the country to the westward. In July, 1755, there was a meeting between the two parties and the site of the fort was selected. When the Assembly met at New Berne, the 28th day of September, Governor Dobbs "recommended the erection of a fort between Third and Fourth creeks, near the South Yadkin, in the county of Rowan (now Iredell), a central spot between the northern and southern boundaries of the province." (Martin's History, Vol. I, pp. 82 and 83.)

The work of constructing the fort was begun in the autumn of 1755, and it was completed the following year. It was constructed of oak logs and was "a good and substantial building, 53 feet long by 40 feet wide, the opposite angles 24 feet by 22 feet. In height 24½ feet. It contains three floors, and there can be discharged from each floor at one and the same time about one hundred muskets." (Col. Rec., Vol.

5, p. 48.) The garrison of Fort Dobbs in the year 1756 consisted of 46 men, both officers and soldiers, and was in command of Capt. Hugh Waddell.

In February, 1756, Captain Waddell left the fort for a short time, having been sent out to negotiate treaties with the Cherokees and the Catawbas, and in May, 1756, there was another conference between the Catawba Indians and their white brethren at the home of Mr. Peter Arran in Salisbury. The Catawbas were led by King Haglar and Chief Justice Henley spoke for the settlers. A treaty was negotiated, and the Indians pledged undying friendship to the settlers.

Troops appear to have been kept in Fort Dobbs almost continuously from the time of its completion until about the year 1762. Williamson's History, Vol. I, p. 83, says that the garrison generally consisted of about fifty men. However, in 1757 Waddell and his company marched to the relief of Fort Loudon, a fort situated about thirty miles from the site of Knoxville, Tennessee; and again in 1758 Waddell, now Colonel Waddell, marched at the head of three companies to take part in the final expedition against Fort Duquesne. They were absent from the fort from the early summer until the winter of 1758, and during that time Fort Dobbs was left in charge of two men, Jacob Franks and an unknown assistant.

During the winter of 1758-59, the fort was of great service to the colonists, for the Cherokees were becoming more and more hostile. A great number of the settlers left their homes and came to dwell in the fort. The men went out in armed bands to work the fields and gather in supplies, while the women and children remained in the fort for protection. One of these armed bands was surprised and attacked by Indians at the home of Moses Potts, about four miles north of the present town of Statesville. Seven of the band were killed on the spot and tradition says that others fell on the way to the fort. One of these is said to have fallen and been buried by his comrades in front of the home of Mr. Alexander Huggins, a short distance from the fort. This old house still stands.

The year 1759 found the raids of the Cherokees increasing, and Hugh Waddell was given power by the Assembly to call out the militia of Orange, Rowan and Anson counties in case of need. During the fall and winter of 1759-60, the fort was again used as a place of refuge, and on the night of February 27th, 1760, an attack was made by sixty or seventy Indians. This party was met by a party of about ten men, including the commanders, Andrew Bailie and Hugh Waddell, at a distance of about three hundred yards from the fort. In regard to this attack, Waddell says in his account: "I had given my party orders not to fire until I gave the word, which they punctually observed. We received the Indians' fire. When I perceived they had almost all fired, I ordered my party to fire, which we did, not further than twelve steps, each loaded with a bullet and seven buckshot. They had nothing to cover them, as they were advancing, either to tomahawk us or to make us prisoners. They found the fire very hot from so small a number, which a good deal confused them. I then ordered my party to retreat, as I found the instant our skirmish began another party had attacked the fort. Upon our re-enforcing the garrison the Indians were soon repulsed, with, I am sure, a considerable loss. From what I myself saw, as well as those I can confide in, they could not have less than ten or twelve killed and wounded, and I believe they have taken six of my horses to carry off their wounded. The next morning we found a great deal of blood and one dead, whom, I suppose, they could not find in the night. On my side I had two men wounded, one of whom I am afraid will die, as he is scalped; the other is in a fair way of recovery; and one boy killed near the fort, whom they durst not advance to scalp. I expected they would have paid me another visit last night as they attack all fortifications by night, but find they did not like their reception." (Col. Rec., Vol. 7, p. 229). Of the two men, who are mentioned as having been wounded, one, Robert Campbell, afterward recovered; but R. Gillespie, Sr., who was scalped, died of his wounds."

There are no further records of attacks against the fort by Indians. During the summer of 1760 the tribe of Catawbas was almost annihilated by a terrible scourge of small-pox, and in 1761 Colonel Waddell led an attack against the Cherokees. They were defeated in a fierce battle near the present town of Franklin, peace was made and the settlers were once more able to dwell in their own homes in peace and safety.

Hugh Waddell, not being longer needed in Fort Dobbs, was allowed to retire from active service, and in 1762 he left the fort and settled upon a lot in Wilmington given him by his friend, Edward Mosely. Captain Andrew Bailie and the garrison of Fort Dobbs left soon after and Walter Lindsay was left to care for the provisions in the fort.

From this time forward we know little concerning Fort Dobbs. In February, 1764, the committee of public claims recommended to the Assembly that the supplies should be removed from the fort to avoid further public expense. There is a tradition that the fort was used for the storage of ammunition during the Revolutionary War, and also that in 1776 it was used as a refuge by settlers during a Cherokee uprising. The story runs that it was finally destroyed by fire, though probably not until the greater portion of it had been removed. The logs which were removed are said to have been used in the construction of the "Stevenson schoolhouse" on the Adderholdt plantation. Tradition also says that one of Governor Dobbs' cannon was thrown into a deep well near the fort, after it had ceased to be used as a stronghold, and in 1847 the old well was opened and excavated to a depth of 40 feet, but no cannon was discovered. It is probable that the cannon was thrown into another well, the traces of which have not been found.

How many settlers were sheltered in the old fort in those bygone days we cannot tell. It is certain that two children were born in it, Rachel Davidson, in 1758, and Margaret Locke, in 1776. Imagination draws many a picture of the dangers and hardships in the life of the early citizen but the reality of it we may not know. Only a few brief records, with here and there a tradition, are left to remind us of the brave men and women who toiled and struggled for existence in the shadow of old Fort Dobbs.

It is the purpose of the North Carolina Daughters of the American Revolution to restore the Old Fort in the near future, so that we may hope to see erected upon this historic site a reproduction of Fort Dobbs, which will serve to perpetuate the memory of the Old Fort and the brave deeds of its people in the hearts of their descendants.

Old Waxhaw

By Lily Doyle Dunlap.

Old Waxhaw Presbyterian Church is of national interest because of the active participancy of its people in the cause of American liberty. It was settled by a sturdy folk who were fleeing from religious oppression and unjust tyranny to freedom of faith and speech—folk who had "moved on," and at every halt been sent further by the club of royal policemen until, taking their stand at Waxhaw, they swore to "run no more, but with God's help and their swords to fight for liberty."

Many of these families were chips from the landed gentry of Ireland and Scotland, and not of plebian ancestry. Years afterwards some of their descendants fell heir to earldoms which they refused to accept.

The date of the first building is not known as it was before the lot was deeded. We know this because the deed made the 9th of May, 1758, contains this phrase: "Beginning at a stake upon the south side of an house built for Divine Service," etc. The deed is made by "Robert Miller and Jean, his wife," to Robert Davis, Robert Ramsay, John Line, Samuel Dunlap and Henry White.

Other early elders of this church were Andrew Pickens, Sr., Patrick Calhoun, Robert Dunlap, Robert Crockett, James Walkup, Andrew Jackson, Sr., William Blair and others, including Alexanders, Hueys, Pinckneys, Crawfords, Jacksons, Montgomerys, Fosters, Carrutherses, Caldwells, etc.

Early ministers were Rev. Alexander Craighead, Rev. William Richardson, Rev. Hugh Waddell, Rev. Hugh McCain and others.

Andrew Pickens, Sr., was the father of Andrew Pickens, Jr., who was a brigadier-general in the Revolution and the progenitor of a prominent South Carolina family—a governor, a diplomat to Russia, and Douscha Pickens Dugas, the "Joan of Arc of South Carolina."

Patrick Calhoun was the father of John C. Calhoun, Vice-President of the United States. He was twice married—first to Jane Craighead, daughter of Rev. Alexander Craighead, who lived only a short time, and secondly to Martha Caldwell, the mother of John C.

The Dunlaps were of a noble old Scotch family who were intimate friends and court advisers of William, Prince of Orange. Eleven of the Waxhaw family were in the Revolution, most of them officers.

The Crocketts were a French Huguenot family who fled to Ireland and on to America. David Crockett, of Alamo fame, was descended from the Waxhaw Crocketts.

James Walkup was a staunch Scotchman and a captain in the war. He owned the mill where was fought the Battle of Walkup's Mill. He was a man who had money, and being much away in the army and knowing the disposition of the Tories he took the precaution to hide his gold and valuables in a pot which he cached in the bottom of the middle of his mill pond. As he had feared, the Tories came to his home plundering for treasure. Chagrined at finding none they hung his son Robert, who was little more than a baby, by his thumbs, trying to force him to tell where the money was hid. The child was too young to put sentences together intelligently but pointed to a stake that his father had driven in the pond to mark the place of the pot. The Tories thought that it was impossible to hide treasure under water, so after relieving themselves of their disappointment by torturing the child, went away.

William Blair was a Scotch-Irishman who, at a tender age, came with his parents to Waxhaw from Antrim, Ireland, in 1754. He, with several cousins, served valiantly in the American army. He was in many battles and in one engagement was wounded. After the war he was offered pay for his services but replied: "If the small competence I now possess fail me I am both able and willing to work for my living, and if it again becomes necessary I am willing to fight for my country without a penny of pay." The wife of his first cousin, also William Blair, was one of those great souled Irish women whose heart melted at sight of suffering. Once, when returning from the American camp near Salisbury, N. C., wither she had been to take clothing and a basket of cheer to her soldier husband, she came upon a smoking ruin about which shivered a woman and several children, who were clad in nothing but night clothes. The Tories had burned their home and all their possessions. Mrs. Blair immediately doffed her skirt which she gave to the woman and went on her horse-back homeward way in her red flannel petticoat.

Andrew Jackson, Sr., was father of Andrew Jackson, Jr., seventh President. The interesting history of this family is known. Andrew Jackson never forgave the British for Tarleton's slaughter at Waxhaw and at the Battle of New Orleans he exclaimed, "Now, by h——, we'll give them a taste of Waxhaw!" and we all know how he kept those words.

Rev. Alexander Craighead was probably the first preacher at Waxhaw. He moved from there to Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, where he became famous as the sower of the seeds that sprouted the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. Some historians even claim that he was also the propagator of the spirit that culminated in the Philadelphia declaration. He was forced to move from Pennsylvania and Virginia because of royal disfavor to his doctrines.

Rev. Hugh Waddell, famous for his brilliance and deep piety, was another minister, and he married a Waxhaw girl, Catherine, daughter of Patrick Calhoun. There is a pretty romance about this marriage that makes an interesting story. The fame of Mr. Waddell had preceded him to Waxhaw, and when it was known that he was coming to preach there the eldership was much exercised over his entertainment, each coveting the honor. It was finally settled that the senior elder should have the privilege and Patrick Calhoun became the host expectant.

The boy preacher, for he was barely out of his teens, was on his horse-back way all unconscious of the furore his advent was causing among the good blue stockings of Waxhaw.

The journey required many days of travel and wherever night overtook him there he slept, housed or unhoused as the situation admitted. One of these nights was like that of Jacob of old, fraught with dreams, not, however, of heavenly angels, but of an earthly angel, who was to ascend with him the hill of life. The end of his journey saw the consummation of this dream to the least detail, to the exceeding embarrassment of the young divine, an embarrassment mixed with joy for he realized that he had found his Rebekah, and she that her Isaac had come, so by and by they married.

John C. Calhoun spent much of his time with this brother and sister, who had laid in him the foundation that was his incentive to greatness.

Rev. William Richardson was the most famous resident minister of Waxhaw. He, like all Presbyterian preachers, believed that education was the first great help in establishing a true and useful religion, and so began a Latin school where many boys of the Carolinas received instruction that fitted them for large service. Of these youths Andrew Pickens, Sr., organized a military company, which exercise later stood them in good stead.

Rev. Richardson was given to attacks of melancholia, caused by the sufferings of his people in Scotland and the condition of the colonies. In one of these he committed suicide. This being deemed an unpardonable act, and one that, if known, would work serious harm to those good practices that he had labored to teach, it seemed expedient to keep the manner of his demise secret. But the suspicious soon detected signs ulterior and tongues began to wag with the result that the beautiful widow was openly accused of having bewitched her husband to his death. The relatives of Mrs. Richardson were resentful and declared that she should be exonerated by a trial for witchcraft, which was that the corpse of the dead be exhumed and the accused one required to touch it, when, if guilty, blood would immediately gush forth. Accordingly a day was set, the congregation assembled, the buried man pulled up and Mrs. Richardson put to the test, but not a drop of blood appeared. 'Tis said that one man crushed her hand into the forehead in his eagerness to see the blood flow. The persecutors had lost.

In the assembly was a courageous youth whose disgust attained to such an heighth at this loathsome indignity to so sweet and innocent a woman that he followed her home and offered to her the comfort of his love and the protection of his strong arm. She no doubt felt the need of both in her childless widowhood, and she soon became Mrs. George Dunlap. When the Revolution came on she displayed heroism. With Mrs. Andrew Jackson, Sr., she nursed the wounded Americans after Tarleton's slaughter, and at Charleston, and was with Mrs. Jackson when she died, nursing her through her illness and preparing her for burial.

William Richardson Davie was a nephew and namesake of the preacher. His mother gave him to her brother and wife at his birth and when five years old he was sent over to his foster parents in the care of his father's nephew. Some years later Mr. and Mrs. Davie came over but little William continued with Mr. and Mrs. Richardson who took much pains with his rearing, intending him for a minister. But God had disposed otherwise and he became a great general in the Revolution, the third Governor of North Carolina, and envoy to France during the reign of Napoleon.

It was the first and second Maryland regiments of artillery under General De Kalb that went to relieve Lincoln, who were cut to pieces by Tarleton.

On the 8th of September, 1780, General Davidson, encamped at Waxhaw, wrote the commanding general: "No people have a better right to protection than those of this country. They have fought bravely and bled freely."

The old church was used as a hospital after Tarleton's slaughter, and many a Carolina and Maryland soldier found their last home in the old cemetery.

These heroes and heroines, with numerous others, rest in this old spot where tall pines whisper requiems and fragrant thorn roses and blue starred periwinkle hold closely the earth about these hallowed mounds.

May our dear boys of today, like Jackson, remember Waxhaw in the spirit, not of hate to any people, but that autocracy must fall and liberty prevail throughout the world.

Pronunciation of "Raleigh"

By Capt. S. A. Ashe.

The Christian Science Monitor in a recent issue says:

"The preparations for the Raleigh commemoration bring up once more the question of how Raleigh should be pronounced. It is very common to hear the name spoken as if it were the Greek Ralli, yet Sir Walter, though spelling his name Ralegh as often as not, quite often spelled it Rauleygh and Raulwy, showing quite plainly that however it was spelt, and there was something like seventy variations of the name, it was never anything but Rauley to the ear. However, the matter is an unimportant one, though most people will admit that the owner of a name should be the person to decide as to its pronunciation."

And a friend asks me to say something about it.

Sir Walter's family name is now written in England as he himself generally wrote it—Ralegh; but over here we fancied Raleigh. But no matter how written the pronunciation might well be the same.

The family was a very old family of Devonshire. It is said—"A Raleigh matched with Damorye's daughter, by Elizabeth de Clare, a grand-daughter of King Edward, the First."

In that part of England, as I understand it, the old Anglo-Saxon e had the sound of a; and a had a sound like aw or au. So Raleigh would have been pronounced Rawly, or Rauly.

Sir Walter generally wrote his name Ralegh, as also did his wife; but some few of his letters are signed Rauleigh and Rauley. Some signatures are Raleigh; and his wife sometimes wrote Raleigh. Others, in writing his name, whether in letters or in court proceedings, appear to have followed the pronunciation.

His pedigree in the Herald's office, from the "Visitation of Devonshire" made in his lifetime, when he wanted to establish kinship with the Queen through Edward, the First, runs—"Sir Hugh Rawleigh," and so on down through ten generations to "Sir Walter Rawleigh," himself.

When he first went to court, Queen Elizabeth knew of him —for his Aunt Kate Ashley had in some measure raised her, and she certainly knew his name; and she wrote it "Rawley"; and she showed him favor and pushed his fortunes "as our Servant Walter Rawley," "in respect of his kindred that have served us near about Our person."

And in the entries in the court records he was "Rawley." "Sir Thomas Parrott and Walter Rawley, gentleman, being called before their Lordships for a fray between them;"—and as "Rawley" he was sent to Fleete prison, till he gave bond to keep the peace.

And when as a gallant he needed trimmings, the warrant book tells us that the Queen gave "to our well-beloved servant, Sir Walter Rawley, Knight, Captain of the Guard, six yards of tawney medley with a fur of black budge."

All through his life, among the courtiers, when they did not write it Ralegh, he was either Rawley, or Raughley, or Rawleighe.

And at his trial, old Coke wrote the name Rawley—and also Raleighe; while in the body of the proceedings he was called indifferently Rawlie, Rawly, Rawley, and his wife was "Rawlye's wife." Others wrote the name Rawleigh, Raghley, and Rawleighe.

But however it was written, the pronunciation seems to have ever been Rawly; and that conforms to the Anglo-Saxon a in Devonshire as I have understood it. Spellings vary, but the pronunciation of old names is maintained through generations. A recent letter from Brookline, a suburb of Boston, narrates: "I was enquiring for the store of Mr. Pierce. Nobody knew; till finally one woman laughed at me, and said, 'Oh, you mean Mr. Prers.' "

In this State, the people commonly call the capital of the State "Rolly." I recall some doggerel of 1858:

"And ————, too, the jolly
Has gone up to Rolly."

Kiffin Yates Rockwell *

By R. B. House
(The North Carolina Historical Commission.)

On September 23, 1916, by cable, telegraph and wireless, news flashed around the world that the aviator, Kiffin Yates Rockwell, after so many miraculous escapes, had at last fallen in combat for France. His comrades in Escadrille 124 mourned him as their best and bravest; France mourned him as a fighter not to be replaced; America mourned him as the second of her sons to fall in air combat, following so closely in the steps of Victor Chapman, her first. All the world paid tribute to him. For Kiffin Yates Rockwell was a leader in that group of young men who left the paths of peace in their own neutral countries to fight for France, and in her person, for civilization. Chapman, Rockwell, McConnell, Genet—these men were the pioneers of America in France, and in the air. They have all fallen on the field of honor, fell there before America entered the war. And now that over sixty thousand Americans, fallen under the Stars and Stripes, sleep in France beside these men, we realize some of the full measure of their achievement, and honor them for leading the way.

But in 1916 the majority of Americans were in that state of mind that echoed the slogan, "He kept us out of war," over the country in a triumphant presidential campaign. Why American boys should give their lives in the European war except as in a gamble for adventure was not clear to most Americans; why they should give them to France was a problem that rankled in the minds of many of our citizens at that time, even pro-German.

*Note.—The Booklet, in presenting this interesting sketch of one of the most renowned heroes of the World War, is departing from a long established custom since the history of the present has not heretofore been considered. The Colonial, Revolutionary and Confederate periods only have received attention. Publishing this is an exception and not intended to introduce a precedent. THE EDITOR.

And so it was that his mother, in Asheville, North Carolina, asked herself why it was that she, a Carolinian by birth and sympathy, should sacrifice her son in France, and her questions were augmented by similar ones from relatives and friends all over the country. Kiffin, though gloriously dead, might have been saved, it seemed. She had tried to save him from himself by persistent entreaties to the Department of State in Washington to get her boy out of the French army, and by similarly persistent demands to the French Government to release her son. But before Kiffin fell she had come to see what he was fighting for, and it was not long after he fell before she was a sister in suffering to thousands of other American mothers who likewise had come to see why it was that their sons had to die in France.

Kiffin Yates Rockwell was the first North Carolinian to give his life in the world war, the first American volunteer for service in France, the first American to bring down a German plane, the premier fighter of his time in the Escadrille LaFayette, and after Victor Chapman, his comrade, the first American airman to fall in battle. He belongs to North Carolina by parentage on his father's side, and by residence, to South Carolina by parentage on the side of his mother, and to Tennessee by the actual event of birth. So it is that the sister states who share in common the glories of achievement in the records of the Old Hickory and Wildcat Divisions, also share in the glory of their premier fighter.

The father of Kiffin Rockwell was James Chester Rockwell, of Whiteville, in Columbus County, North Carolina. By vocation he was a Baptist preacher, by avocation a poet of promise. The Rockwell family is of French extraction, being lineally descended from Ralph de Rocheville. The first of the name to settle in America was the Puritan deacon, William Rockwell, who came to live in Dorchester, Massachusetts, in the year 1630. When the family came into North Carolina is not clear, but they were established in this State before the Civil War, for from North Carolina Henry Clay Rockwell, the aviator's grandfather, went as a captain in the Confederate Army.

Kiffin's mother was Loula Ayres, daughter of Major Enoch Shaw Ayres, of South Carolina, himself a Confederate veteran. She comes also of French Huguenot extraction. An early member of the Rockwell family was on the staff of General Washington.

From these parents Kiffin Yates Rockwell was born in Newport, Tennessee, September 20, 1892. His parents had moved to Newport sometime before this in search of health for his father. He was named Kiffin in honor of William Kiffin, an English home missionary in the fifteenth century, and Yates for Matthew Yates, a foreign missionary from North Carolina in the nineteenth century. At the age of 26 his father died, leaving his mother to care for Kiffin, his elder brother, Paul Ayres, and a younger sister.

His mother became a teacher, and founded the system of schools that obtains today in the little town of Newport. While Kiffin was still in the grammar grades she moved with her family to Asheville, to give them better opportunities in education and herself in business. She took up the successful practice of osteopathy. Kiffin entered the Orange Street school, where he became a favorite pupil of Mrs. Mary Walden Williamson. Dr. George T. Winston, in a memorial to Kiffin Rockwell, quotes Mrs. Williamson in the following description of Kiffin at the age of fifteen:

"A handsome, intelligent, chivalrous boy of fifteen, immaculate in person as in honor, impatient of the tedium of school routine, restive, though ever courteous under restraint; with serious deep-set, gray-blue eyes, aglow with enthusiasm over tales of daring adventure; breaking rarely into surprising light of merriment." Even this early Kiffin and Paul pondered over the history of their ancestral country, France, and reached the conclusion that if France were ever attacked they would fight for her.

Kiffin's mother had hoped for him to lead a life of scholarship. With this in view, she encouraged him to pursue studies at Virginia Military Institute, and later at Washington and Lee University. Although Kiffin spent some years at Virginia Military Institute and Washington and Lee, it was with no love for scholarship, and no intention of leading a scholarly existence. One real association of school days that inspired him to the day of his death was membership in the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity. Both he and his brother Paul were good fraternity men, loyal and ideal.

Without graduating he went from college into advertising journalism, organizing and conducting successfully a project for publishing advertising editions of newspapers. In this business he traveled over the United States and Canada, finally coming to rest in Atlanta, Georgia, as a member of the Massingale Advertising Agency. It was here that he was working when in August, 1914, Europe hurried into war. Kiffin and Paul Rockwell were on their way to France on August 3, 1914, by the first boat they could take. Landing in Liverpool, they made arrangements at the French embassy for entering the French army. From London they went by Havre to Paris, and there at the Invalides entered the French service on August 30, 1914. Training first at Rouen, then at Toulouse, and finally at Camp de Mailly, they made ready for a winter in the trenches with the Foreign Legion.

After many months in the trenches, he moved with his regiment to the 1915 battles in Artois. At the storming of Neuville-Saint-Vaast, May, 1915, he fell severely wounded in the thigh by a bullet. He recovered from his wounds, and by opportunity secured for him by influential friends, began the study of aviation, completing his education in the air in time to become, with Chapman, Prince, Thaw, Cowdin, McConnell and others, the organizer of the Escadrille LaFayette. His success was immediate. On May 18, 1916, at Hartmannsvillerskopp in Alsace, he brought down the first German plane of the many to fall at the hands of the Escadrille LaFayette. In rapid succession he won the Medaille Militaire, the Croix de Guerre, and three palms for additional citations. He rose from pilot to brevet lieutenant in the space of four months. Over Verdun he was indefatigable, engaging in over thirty-four victorious flights, and winning the title, "Aristocrat of the Air." By September he had brought down three planes which officially were credited to him, and seven more of which there is no reasonable doubt as to his credit. Captain Thenault, his flight commander, said of him: "Where Rockwell was, the German could not pass, but was forced rapidly to take shelter on the ground." In one combat he was struck in the face by an explosive bullet. Refusing to retire for the day, he re-engaged the enemy and brought down another plane.

On September 23, 1916, Rockwell attacked the enemy near the same spot where he had won his first victory. Although he had come successfully through one hundred and forty-one previous battles, and single-handed had driven off ten German planes, this time fate willed that he should fall —killed by an explosive bullet from a German machine gun. He was buried at Luxiul with the honors of a general. "The best and bravest of us is no more," was the comment of his commander and his comrades.

Kiffin Rockwell's achievements in the air and previously in the trenches rank him as one of the greatest of the allied fighters. For his services he received the highest honor the French Government can give. But the most remarkable feature of his life is the perfect coordination of purpose and achievement in his spirit. He was indefatigable in battle because he was invincible in his conviction that he was defending civilization. In his school days, even, he had considered the possibility of France's being attacked and had resolved to fight for her. On August 3, 1914, he offered his services to the French Government. To his brother Paul he wrote, "If France should lose, I feel that I should no longer want to live." But with all his love for France he retained his sense of responsibility as an American. "I am paying my part of America's debt for Lafayette and Rochambeau," was his expression that has been echoed and re-echoed by American fighters from private to General Pershing.

His attitude towards death was a triumphant assertion of immortality. In a letter to Mrs. John Jay Chapman about the death of Victor, he dwells repeatedly on the idea that death had no part in such a life as Victor's; that Victor is still alive and fighting because his spirit has passed into his comrades. On another occasion he gave expression to an attitude toward death that caught the imagination of the French, and became a part of their own thought. "From the day a man enters the army," he said, "he should consider himself as good as dead; then every day of life is just that much gained." Acting on this belief he hardly gave his attendants time to fill the gas tank of his plane and keep it in repair, so constantly was he fighting.

Not the least of his victories was his winning his mother's support. Mrs. Rockwell had rebelled against his going to France at all, and she had continued to move the American and French governments in efforts to get Kiffin back home, until finally Kiffin brought her to realize that he could not retire from the struggle to which he had committed himself, and that he would not if he could. For he wrote her in his last words that referred to death, "If I die I want you to know that I have died as every man ought to die—fighting for what is right. I do not feel that I am fighting for France alone, but for the cause of all humanity—the greatest of all causes." Catching up in these words the whole spirit of America as it arose at white heat for war, Kiffin not only won his mother to his cause, but his countrymen also. Of the thousands of Americans who followed him in death, he became an elder brother, a pioneer in the crusade for humanity.

GEN. WILLIAM RUFFIN COX

Address of Hon. Frank S. Spruill, of Rocky Mount, in presenting to the State the portrait of the distinguished Confederate officer.

I am commissioned by Mrs. William Ruffin Cox to present to the State this portrait of its distinguished son, and to speak briefly of his illustrious career and great achievements.

I approach the performance of this pleasing task with cheerful alacrity, for chronicler has rarely had a richer theme.

The records of history are more and more becoming pictorial. Posterity, reading of the high deeds of some dead and gone soldier or statesman, naturally desires to know what manner of man he was. In the absence of portrait or likeness, imagination often supplies the details, and, if his career has been one of great deeds and knightly prowess, we think of him as one

> "—— like old Goliath tall,
> His spear an hundred weight."

It is meet that we should hang upon the walls of the State's Hall of History portraits of the men who have made our history glorious. They remind us of the illimitable vastness of opportunity to him who is willing to serve; they preserve in pictorial form the history and traditions of a great though modest commonwealth; they inspire us with a laudable desire to live our lives that posterity may say of us that we also "have done the State some service."

And so we come today to speak of one who writ his name large in the annals of the State's history; of one who in every walk of life into which he directed his steps, made the observer take note that a man had passed.

In our childhood days we used to stand against the wall to be measured of our stature, and in many an old homestead in the State upon the crumbling walls are marked the records of the children's annual growth. It was before the days of automatic devices that, for a penny in the slot, will weigh and measure you, and prophesy your future fortune.

It is my purpose briefly to stand General William Ruffin Cox against the wall of history, and measure, as best I may, his stature as a soldier, as a statesman, and as a civilian.

It is not necessary or desirable to make this address a mere biographical sketch of our distinguished subject; a skillfuller and abler hand than mine has done this. Captain S. A. Ashe has penned the inspiring story and preserved it in permanent form, in volume one of the "Biographical History of North Carolina."

I have drawn largely upon this incomparable sketch for my facts in the preparation of this paper, and here and now wish to make to him due acknowledgement.

Born of highly honorable parentage, on March 11, 1832, General Cox was a descendant of the Cavalier rather than the Puritan. He was orphaned by his father's death when only four years old, and upon his cultured and gifted mother fell the burden of his early training. There was something in the serene and stately bearing of the man—in his perfect poise—in the careful modulation of his rich masculine voice—and in his grave and dignified courtesy, that, to the end, reflected the early impression of that magical mother love and training.

He came to the bar in Tennessee in 1852, and resided at Nashville until 1857, as the junior partner of John G. Ferguson, a lawyer of distinction and a kinsman of Hon. G. S. Ferguson, some time judge of our Superior Court.

In 1857 he married Miss Penelope B. Battle, sister of the wife of the late Dr. Kemp P. Battle, of Chapel Hill, and came to North Carolina to live.

The mutterings of the coming storm were already audible. The political atmosphere was becoming more and more tense and surcharged with feeling and, as the crisis approached, the question of State's rights was being discussed, not always calmly, alike by the learned and the unlearned. General Cox, who had, in 1859, removed to Raleigh, was an ardent believer in the doctrine of State's rights as expounded by Mr. Jefferson Davis, and, believing that war was inevitable, in company with several others, he equiped a battery. So began his highly honorable military career.

Almost immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities, he was appointed by Governor Ellis, major of the Second North Carolina troops and entered upon actual service.

Time and space will permit us to do no more than touch upon the "high lights" of one of the most unique military careers in the great War between the States. General Cox and the Second North Carolina Troops were to win imperishable renown before the curtain fell upon the lurid drama. At Mechanicsville, on June 26, 1862, and lasting through seven days of shot and shell, he and his regiment received their first baptism of fire, and helped to hurl back McClellan's incomparable army and "to drive it, defeated, disorganized, and cowering, under the protection of the Federal gunboats at Harrison's Landing." After that he was a veteran, cool and intrepid.

At Malvern Hill, he was severly wounded and could not rejoin his regiment until after the battle of South Mountain. Followed in rapid sequence, Sharpsburg, bloody and desperate; victory at Fredericksburg; and then Chancellorsville, with its unutterable tragedy. Here we pause to quote from Captain Ashe's spirited account:

"At Chancellorsville, on Friday evening, Colonel Cox moved up and drove in Hooker's outposts, the regiment lying that night so near to the enemy that all orders were given in whispers; and the next morning Cox's regiment was one of the sixteen North Carolina regiments that Jackson led in his memorable march across Hooker's front, reaching the rear of Siegel's troops about sunset. The men were in line, stooping like athletes, when Ramseur, their brigade commander, ordered 'forward at once' and Cox, leading his regiment, drove the enemy from their works; but his troops were subjected to a terrific enfilading artillary fire at only two hundred yards distance, and in fifteen minutes he lost 300 of the 400 men he had carried in with him. The gallant colonel himself received five wounds, but continued on the field until exhausted. Of him the lamented Ramseur said in his report: The manly and chivalrous Cox of the Second North Carolina, the accomplished gentleman, splendid soldier and warm friend, who, though wounded five times, remained with his regiment until exhausted. In common with the entire command, I regret his temporary absence from the field, where he loves to be.' The brigade received, through General Lee, a message of praise from the dying lips of General Jackson."

Spottsylvania, with its record of glorious achievement, followed and the part played by the brigade, of which General Cox's regiment was a part, evoked from General Lee words of personal thanks for their gallant conduct, and brought to General Cox his commission as Brigadier General. "After that time," to quote again from Captain Ashe's inspiring account, "General Cox led the brigade that, under Anderson and Ramseur, had been so distinguished in all the fields of blood and carnage, in which the Army of Northern Virginia had won such glory."

It was to fall to the lot of General Cox's brigade, under his leadership, to further immortalize itself. He led the brigade to Silver Springs within a few miles and in sight of the White House at Washington. This was the nearest point to the seat of the Federal Government which the Confederate troops at any time approached. Thence he was recalled to General Lee's aid at Petersburg to share therewith his brigade all the hardships and cruel privations of that memorable siege. I quote again from Captain Ashe's vivid account:

"Once more it was General Cox's fortune to draw from General Lee an expression of high commendation. It was during the retreat from Petersburg, at Salior's Creek, just after Lee's retiring army had been overwhelmed, and the utmost confusion prevailed, the soldiers straggling along hopelessly, many leaving deliberately for their homes, and the demoralization increasing every moment, while the enemy, in overwhelming numbers, pressed on so closely that a stand had to be made to save the trains, upon which all depended. Lee sent his staff to rally the stragglers, but they met with indifferent success. All seemed mixed in hopeless, inextricable confusion, and the greatest disorder prevailed, when presently an orderly column approached—a small but entire brigade—its commander at its head, and colors flying, and it filed promptly and with precision into its appointed position. A smile of momentary joy passed over the distressed features of General Lee, as he called out to an aide, "What troops are those?" "Cox's North Carolina Brigade," was the reply. Taking off his hat and bowing his head, with courtesy and kindly feeling, General Lee exclaimed, "God bless gallant old North Carolina!" This occasion has been graphically described in a public address made by Governor Vance after the war.

Stand General Cox, therefore, against the wall of history and measure his stature as a soldier. Assaying him by his accomplishments and what he attained, we know it may be said of him that no more gallant soldier than this distinguished North Carolinian went forth from the State to fight its battles. In his body he bore the marks of eleven wounds received during those four years.

Was his career as a statesman any less distinguished? Let us examine the record in this respect.

With the war ended and the return of the disbanded soldiers to civil life after four years of military duty, the demand for high and disinterested service was tragically great. War is the very culmination of lawlessness; it is the resort of men to primitive and lawless methods of arbitrament, and law ends where war begins. The lawlessness, which is the culmination of and is typified in war, affects to the very core, the citizenship that is engaged. In proof of this, you have but to observe the wave of crime and rapine that has swept over this country in the two years and a half since the armistice was signed. We have stood amazed and horrified at the recital of crimes perpetrated even in our very midst, and no hamlet is so quiet or so well ordered that it has not its chapter of bloodshed and outrage. Human life becomes so cheap, and property rights of so small account, when a million men are fighting breast to breast at each other's throats, that the lust to kill cannot be soothed into quiet by the mere signing of an armistice or treaty.

So, when General Cox, who at the time of the surrender had become an unique and dominant figure in the Army of Northern Virginia, surrendered his sword and laid aside the habiliments of war, he came home to take up a task vaster in its significance and ultimate fruitage than were his duties as a soldier. He was to throw his great prestige and strong personality into the labor of rebuilding a chaotic and bankrupt State. He was to co-operate with and aid other leaders in directing the energies and passions, engendered by war, into channels that would not only render them innocuous, but positively helpful. Here was a mighty dynamic force that was full of dangerous menace; but, if it could be controlled and directed, it would become potential for the accomplishment of great good to the State.

Mr. President, as proud as we are and should ever be of the glorious record of the North Carolina Troops in the Confederate service, I declare to you that, in my judgment, the brightest page in our great State's great history is that written by leaders and led in those years following hard upon the war. Even with half a century between us and those fateful years when our very civilization was gasping for its life, and our social and political institutions were debauched and chaotic, we are too close to the tragic events to understand their significance, or to rightly appreciate the mighty part played by those great souled men. More years yet are needed to give us the proper perspective of the great and sublime devotion of those men who took upon themselves the high and holy duty of rebuilding the wearied, discouraged and broken State.

Among those men there immediately moved out to the front the martial figure of the man of whom we speak.

Coming back to Raleigh, he began the practise of law. A solicitor of the metropolis district was to be elected, and General Cox had the courage, although the district was overwhelmingly Republican, to announce himself as a candidate for the Democratic nomination. It was the first formal notice given by the returning remnant of Lee's army that it would not suffer things in North Carolina to go by default. It rang out the brave challenge that "The old guard can die, but it cannot surrender." The Republican organization in the district approached him with the proposition that if he would run as an independent, the organization would endorse him. He refused its blandishments and ran on the ticket as a Democrat, and, when the election returns were in, to the joy and surprise of his friends, he was found to have been elected by a narrow margin.

This office, so full of possibilities for good when administered by a high-minded, clean man, and so potent for evil if maladministered, he filled with a high credit to himself and with entire satisfaction to the district, for six years. His capabilities being thus successfully subjected to the acid test, his further promotion came rapidly, but brought with it increased responsibility and gruelling labor; for

Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night."

He had become Chairman of the State Democratic Executive Committee and, when his term as Solicitor ended, he refused a renomination in order to devote all his powers and energy to overthrowing the Republican machine in the State. In 1874, while he was Chairman, the State was redeemed by a Democratic majority of about 13,000. In 1875, when the popular vote was being had upon the State Constitutional Convention, there went out from his office, as Chairman of the State Executive Committee, that trenchant and historic telegram to the Democratic Headquarters in Robeson: "As you love your State, hold Robeson." Doubtless as a result of this patriotic appeal, Robeson was held and the State was saved. I count it one of my high privileges to have heard General Cox, who was as modest about his own exploits as a woman, personally relate the stirring narrative.

In 1876, still retaining the chairmanship of the State Executive Committee, he conducted the great Vance-Settle campaign, resulting in the election of Governor Vance, after the most dramatic contest ever waged in the State.

In 1877, he was appointed Judge of the Superior Court for the Sixth District, and discharged most acceptably and ably the duties of this high office until he resigned to seek and to canvass for the nomination for Congress. Having won the nomination, he was triumphantly elected, serving in the United States Congress for six years.

In 1892, General Cox was elected Secretary of the Senate of the United States, a position of great honor and trust. To the discharge of the duties of this office, he brought all his great natural ability and fine culture. After the expiration of his term of office as Secretary of the Senate, he held no other political office.

If the measure of a man's powers be the success he attains in all his undertakings, surely measuring General Cox's civil life upon the wall of history, he was a statesman. In his offiice as solicitor, he had been clean, strong, capable and absolutely unafraid. He came to the office in troublous times, and he met its duties in the calm, commanding way that banishes difficulties almost without a conflict. His administration of the usually thankless office of chairman of the State Executive Committee was so brilliant and so successful that it has passed into the party's most glorious history. He came to the bench while the code system was yet in its experimental stage in the State and his urbanity, his dignity, his great common sense, his broad reading and his innate courtesy made him an ideal nisi prius judge. He went into the Congress of the United States and became the friend and adviser of the President, and trusted councilor of the great party leaders. He passed into the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and was on terms of intimacy with those great souls "who held manhood cheap that was not bottomed fast on rock-ribbed honesty." He left that office, where yet the older generation speak of him as the "Chivalric Cox," and came to his home and farm on Tar River, in Edgecombe County, to live the simple quiet life of the Southern planter.

Great warrior, distinguished and successful statesman, what will he do amid the homely surroundings of the North Carolina cotton plantation with the proverbial "nigger and his mule"?

To the direction of his great farm he brought the order and system of the soldier and the vision and courage of the statesman. He introduced blooded stock and modern machinery. He raised the finest sheep and the best pigs in the county. His yield per acre was a little better than any of his neighbors. If rain or drought, flood or storm came, he was always calm and imperturbable, and no man ever heard him utter a word of complaint. In his well selected and large library he read not only history and biography, but chemistry and books on food plant and volumes on agricultural science. Your speaker has more than once been down to the country home at Penelo and found the general with his books on the floors and tables all around him, running down the subject of scientific fertilization.

He was a successful farmer. He entered no field of activity in which he did not succeed, and it was difficult at the end of his distinguished life to say in which field were his most successful achievements.

Three years after the death of his first wife, who died in 1880, General Cox married Miss Fannie Augusta Lyman, daughter of the Rt. Rev. Theodore B. Lyman, Bishop of North Carolina. After two years of wedded life she died, leaving her surviving two sons: Col. Albert L. Cox, distinguished soldier, judge and lawyer of this city, and Captain Frances Cox, now a candidate for Holy Orders.

In June, 1905, General Cox was married to the charming and gracious Mrs. Herbert A. Claiborne, daughter of Col. Henry C. Cabell, of Richmond, Va., who graces this occasion with her presence today.

I have tried more than once to summarize, or catalogue, those particular or accentuated virtues or characteristics which marked General Cox as truly great. He was a man of singularly handsome person, tall, erect and soldierly in bearing, with high-bred classical features. His manner was one of utmost composure and quiet certitude. His imperturbability could not be shaken, and he looked the part of a man, to whom, in great crises, other men would naturally turn for leadership. His dominant characteristics I would catalogue as follows:

He was physically and morally as brave a man as I ever knew, and this mental condition was that which made him so singularly effective when emergency arose. His courage was so unconscious and so ingrained that I have frequently thought it was the cause, at least in larger part, of his serene composure and quiet bearing.

He was inherently a just man. Although by training and habit of mind he was a rigid disciplinarian, yet there was nothing about him of the martinet, and in determining, as he was frequently called upon to do, the small controversies that were inevitable in the conduct of a large farm, whether between landlord and tenant, or cropper and cropper, he was as impersonal as he had been when presiding as a judge.

He was rigidly honest, and by that term I do not mean simply that he discharged his legal obligations; he did more than that—he dared to follow truth to its ultimate end, and the popularity or unpopularity of the conclusions he reached did not in the slightest way affect him.

He was a clean man. He thought and lived cleanly. His mind was occupied with clean thoughts, and he nourished it upon good books and wholesome literature. He never told an anecdote of questionable character, or uttered an obscene or profane word.

He was an intensely patriotic man, and with a devotion as ardent as a lover for his mistress, he loved North Carolina—her heritage and her history—her traditions and her customs—her people and her institutions. In the evening of his long and eventful life, as he sat in the shadow of the majestic oaks that embowered his home, he thought much upon the problems that were arising and presenting themselves for solution, and he believed with all the strength of his soul in the ability of the State to wisely solve them and to attain her future great destiny.

He was one of the most evenly courteous men in his manner and bearing that I ever saw. A patrician by birth and association, he was yet as gravely courteous and as formally polite to the humblest mule driver on his farm as he was to the greatest of the historic figures amid whom he had lived his eventful life. Calm, strong, urbane and dignified, he went through life, and the world knew him as one born to command.

In a career crowned with high achievements, both in military and civil life, there was nothing adventitious or accidental. There was in him a definite nobility of soul and mind and person which marked him as one of nature's noblemen. His fearlessness and heroic courage; his perfect sense of justice; his unblemished integrity; his intense and flaming patriotism; his fund of practical common sense; his perfect poise and unruffled composure; his manly bearing and unfailing courtesy, added to his singularly handsome face and person and to his splendid physique—combined to make him one of "The Choice and Master Spirits of this Age."

Mr. President, in behalf of his bereaved and gracious widow, I have the honor to formally present to the North Carolina Hall of History this excellent portrait of the man, in honoring whom we honor ourselves. For her I request that it may be hung on the walls of this building, to the end that future generations, looking upon his strong, composed and handsome features, may seek to emulate his high example of service and devotion.

GEN. JAMES JOHNSTON PETTIGREW, C. S. A.

Address by Chief Justice Walter Clark, of North Carolina, at the Unveiling of the Memorial Marble Pillar and Tablet to General Pettigrew near Bunker Hill, W. Va., September 17, 1920.

Near this spot died James Johnston Pettigrew, a native of North Carolina and brigadier general in the armies of the Confederate States, who commanded Heth's Division in the memorable assault on Cemetery Ridge at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863. Wounded fatally on the retreat at Falling Waters, Md., on July 14, 1863, he died here on the morning of July 17. His remains were removed to Raleigh, N. C., where they lay in the rotunda of the capitol, surrounded with due honor, and were interred in the cemetery at the capital of his native State. After the war they were removed to the spot where he first saw the light in eastern Carolina, where the earliest rays of the rising sun gild the summit of the shaft that marks his grave.

One who was more than man said: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." (John xv. 13.)

It is for this reason that men visit with awe and veneration the great fields where men has died for men and with bared heads stand at Bunker Hill, at Saratoga, at Yorktown, and on the great fields of the War between the States.

Dr. Johnson said: "That man is little to be envied whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon or whose piety would not grow warmer amid the ruins of Iona."

Whether the existence of those who have passed beyond the veil is but a fond dream of hope, as some say, or whether they live again, as we believe, "far advanced in state in the lives of just men made perfect," it is certain that what they have been here, what they have done here, what they have said abides with us and is a living influence moving upon our lives to-day. In a recent speech by D'Annunzio at Rome he moved his audience by asking: "Do you not hear the tramp of the army of the dead on the march? All along their route they find the footprints of the marching legions of Cæsar and hear the distant tread of those who went before."

It is said that in the most desperate hour of Verdun a wounded Frenchman called out madly: "Arise, ye dead." His appeal galvanized into supreme resistance the wounded and shattered columns of France. The message spread throughout the French army, and the German advance was stayed at the very moment when it seemed about to become victorious.

The same thought was with the prophet Ezekiel (xxxvii. 9) when he said: "Come from the four winds, O Breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live, * * * and they lived, and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army." There was no actual physical resurrection, but the prophet was calling upon the influence of their deeds upon the living.

The example of those who have sacrificed life for their country and liberty is an appeal which never dies and rings down the ages whenever a column has faltered or a loved leader has fallen. The memory of such sacrifices moves the hearts of men.

> "'Mid Jersey snows, the march it led,
> The moor at Marston felt its tread."

No Confederate soldier ever failed to be impressed with the cordial hospitality and loyalty of Virginia. Time has not obliterated this recollection nor dulled these qualities in the people of this great State to this day.

We are here to-day to bear tribute to the memory of a brave officer, a leader among the gallant men of the South in one of the greatest struggles of all time. It is fit and proper that we should make some brief note upon the career of the gallant, talented, and distinguished young officer to whom we place this tablet in perpetual memorial.

James Johnston Pettigrew was born at Bonarva, on his family estate at Lake Scuppernong, in Tyrrell County, in Eastern North Carolina, on July 4, 1828. His family was of French origin, but in the fifteenth century removed to Scotland, where they held an estate near Glasglow in 1492, the year Columbus discovered America. A branch of the family later removed to North Ireland, whence the great-grandfather of General Pettigrew in 1732, the year of Washington's nativity, came to Pennsylvania and twenty years later to North Carolina. His son, the grandfather of General Pettigrew, was the first bishop elect of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina. Bishop Pettigrew's son, the General's father, was elected to Congress in 1835, receiving the rare compliment of every vote in his county except three out of seven hundred cast.

General Pettigrew had the misfortune to lose his mother when he was two years of age. Educated at Hillsboro under the well-known instructor, Mr. Bingham, he entered the University of North Carolina in 1843 and graduated at the head of his class in June, 1847, achieving the reputation of being the most talented youth who ever graduated at that historic institution. His class, of which he was easily the leader, was one of the most distinguished that the University has ever graduated, and it was a singular coincidence that side by side at recitation there sat in alphabetical order four men who later attained the highest honors: Brig. Gen. James Johnston Pettigrew; John Pool, who became United States Senator; Matthew W. Ransom, brigadier general in the Confederate army and later for twenty-three years a Senator of the United States; and Alfred M. Scales, also a brigadier general in the army of the Confederacy, a member of the United States Congress, and for four years Governor of his native State. Of such men the University can say, like the mother of the Gracchi: "These are my jewels."

At the commencement at which he graduated there was in attendance President Polk, who was himself a graduate of that institution; United States Secretary of State John Y. Mason; and Lieut. Matthew Fontaine Maury, of the National Observatory, who, impressed by the homage univerally paid to the talents of the young student, offered him a position in the observatory, which he accepted.

Later he obtained license for the practice of law and located in Charleston, S. C. On the advice of friends he soon after proceeded to Berlin and other universities in Germany to perfect himself in the study of the Roman civil law. He remained three years in Europe where he traveled extensively and acquired the faculty of being able to speak at ease German, French, Italian, and Spanish. For a while he then became secretary of legation to Hon. D. M. Barringer, of North Carolina, who was then our Minister to the Spanish Court, and wrote a delightful volume, "Spain and the Spaniards."

Returning to Charleston, his success at the bar was brilliant. He was elected to the legislature in 1855 and achieved distinction.

In 1859 he went to Europe to offer his services to Count Cavour to serve in the Italian army in the war with Austria, but the battle of Solferino put an end to that struggle before his services could be accepted.

Pettigrew was colonel of a South Carolina rifle regiment when Fort Sumter was fired on, April 12, 1861. As such he received the surrender of Castle Pinckney. Failing later to have his regiment promptly sent to the army in Virginia, in his impatience he resigned and enlisted as a private in Hampton's Legion, which he accompanied to Virginia.

Passing through Raleigh, he was recognized by friends, and a few days later was surprised by a telegram announcing his unsolicited election as colonel of the 22d Regiment of North Carolina Troops, which was being organized at Camp Ellis, near Raleigh.

I was at that time attached to the regiment and saw Colonel Pettigrew for the first time on his arrival in Raleigh. Some description of his appearance may not be without interest. He was slendor of build, swarthy of complexion, dark hair and mustache, and with dark eyes the most brilliant and piercing. He was quick in his movements and quick in perception and in his decision. For several months, and until I was transfered to another command, I occupied a tent near to his and saw him daily. His habit was to pace restlessly up and down in front of his tent with a cigar in his mouth which was never lighted.

Later I served on the staff of Gen. Matthew W. Ransom, who had been his competitor for honors at the University, and thus had the good fortune of knowing them both.

As gentle and modest as a woman, there was an undoubted capacity to command, which obtained for Pettigrew instant obedience, but a kindness and bearing which won affection, and chivalry and courtesy which marked him as every inch a gentleman.

Ordered to Virginia in July, 1861, our regiment was encamped at Rocketts, just below Richmond, whence in the fall of 1861 the regiment was ordered to Acquia Creek; thence we were sent up to Quantico and stationed near Dumfries in the rear of the batteries at Evansport, which were erected to impede the navigation of the Potomac by the Federals.

In the spring of 1862 he was tendered the appointment of brigadier general in another brigade, but he declined to accept the promotion because it would separate him from his regiment. A little later, being offered the command of brigadier general of the brigade to which his regiment belonged, he accepted. He was on the Peninsula under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston and shared in the retreat to Richmond in May, 1862.

On June 1, 1862, in the battle of Seven Pines, he was severely wounded in a charge which he led with great gallantry, and left for dead upon the field, he fell into the hands of the enemy. It is not generally known that after he was shot down and left unconscious on the field General Pettigrew was bayoneted by the enemy. This must have been one of the very few occasions on which this occurred in our war. Yet it is attested by a letter from General Pettigrew to his adjutant general, Capt. John W. Hinsdale, a gallant Confedeedate soldier, who had his horse killed under him and who was later colonel of the 72d North Carolina Regiment and is one of the most distinguished lawyers in North Carolina and now living in Raleigh. The following is a verbatim extract from the original, which Colonel Hinsdale has in his possession: "Major Lacy told me you were all disturbed at not bringing me off the field. You could not possibly have changed it. At the time I entered the wood none of the staff were with me, all having been sent off. I did not expect to be in the woods more than ten minutes, but I was unfortunately shot while attempting to ascertain the position of the enemy. The ball entered the lower part of the throat, striking the windpipe, glanced to the right, passed under the collar bone, struck the head of the shoulder, and glanced again upward, tearing the bones. It unfortunately cut an artery, and I would have bled to death had it not been for Colonel Bull. I became entirely unconscious. I subsequently received another shot in the left arm and a bayonet in the right leg, spent the night on the battle field, and a little before day was carried to a Yankee camp. My right leg is still partially paralyzed, but I am recovering the use of it."

On his exchange, his brigade having been placed under the command of the lamented General Pender, he was given the command of another brigade, with which he repelled the Federal raid into Martin County in the fall of 1862 and participated in the defeat of Foster's expedition in December, 1862, against Goldsboro. In the following spring he was under Gen. D. H. Hill in his attack upon Washington, N. C.

When Stoneman made his raid on Richmond, General Pettigrew was sent with his brigade to the protection of that city and was stationed at Hanover Junction. Later his brigade was assigned to Heth's Division, A. P. Hill's Corps, in the Army of Northern Virginia, and was in the advance to Gettysburg. His brigade, one of the largest and best in the army, at that time consisted of the 11th North Carolina commanded by Col. (later Gen.) Collett Leventhorpe; the 26th North Carolina, commanded by Col. H. K. Burgwyn, the gallant young soldier who laid down his life at Gettysburg in a most gallant charge when only twenty-one years of age; the 44th North Carolina, Col. Thomas C. Singletary; the 47th North Carolina, Col. G. H. Faribault; and the 52d North Carolina, Col. J. K. Marshall. This brigade had originally contained the 17th North Carolina, commanded by Col. W. F. Martin; but when, after the battles around Richmond in 1862, Gen. James G. Martin returned to North Carolina, he took with him his brother's regiment, and it was replaced by the transfer to Pettigrew's of the 26th North Carolina, then commanded by Col. (later Gov.) Z. B. Vance, from Ransom's Brigade. This was later commanded, after Vance's election as Governor, by that gallant young soldier, Col. Harry K. Burgwyn.

On the advance into Maryland the 44th Regiment was left to assist in guarding Richmond; but the ranks of the other four regiments were full, and the brigade presented a superb appearance with the distinguished commander at its head. The loss of the brigade in the battle of Gettysburg was the heaviest of any in the army, and one regiment, the 26th, suffered the heaviest loss of any regiment on either side in any one battle during the entire war.

On the third day at Gettysburg, General Heth having been wounded, the division of four brigades was commanded by General Pettigrew, who went forward on horseback, riding close up behind his men. His horse was killed under him, and the General himself was wounded near the stone wall, which was the Ultima Thule of the Confederate advance. This wound in his hand and his death not long after prevented his writing his report of the charge, which would have prevented the subsequent controversy.

The gallantry of Pettigrew's Brigade is most eloquently told by the official returns, which show that on the opening of the battle on July 1 its four regiments reported present for duty three thousand men, of whom on the morning of the 4th only nine hundred and thirty-five were left. General Pettigrew himself was wounded, and all of his field officers were killed or wounded except one, who was captured, and the brigade was commanded by Major Jones, of the 26th, who had been wounded. Two of General Pettigrew's staff were killed. In the battle on July 1 Captain Tuttle's company, of the 26th North Carolina Regiment, of three officers and eighty-four men were all killed and wounded except one. On the same date Company C, of the 11th North Carolina, lost two officers killed and thirty-four out of thirty-eight men killed and wounded. Its captain, Byrd, brought off the regimental flag, the flag bearer being shot.

The official reports of the battle of Gettysburg show that 2,592 Confederates were killed and 12,707 wounded. Of the killed. 700 were from North Carolina, 435 Georgians, 399 Virginians, 258 Mississippians, 217 South Carolinians, and 204 Alabamians. The three brigades that lost the most men were Pettigrew's North Carolina (190 killed), Davis's Mississippi, in which there was one North Carolina regiment, the 55th (180 killed), and Daniel's North Carolina (165 killed). Pickett's Division of three brigades had 214 killed.

The historic charge made on the 3d of July was composed of Pickett's Division on the right, of three brigades, Gar-nett's and Kemper's, with Armistead's in the second line. On the left of Pickett's was Heth's Division, composed of Archer's, Pettigrew's, Davis's, and Brockenbrough's brigades. This division was led by Pettigrew, General Heth having been wounded. In the rear of this division marched Lane's and Scale's brigades, both from North Carolina.

The stone wall which Pickett and Pettigrew were sent forward to take had a re-entrant angle in front of Pettigrew's part of the line. Owing to this, some of Pickett's men, striking the wall first, passed over it at the angle, and General Armistead was killed forty yards on the other side, but too few got over to hold the ground beyond the wall. The wall in front of Pettigrew being eighty yards farther on, Capt. E. F. Satterfield, of the 55th North Carolina Regiment, was killed, and others were killed or wounded at the wall in their front and thus fell farthest to the front, though on this side of the wall. While General Armistead and others of Pickett's men were killed or wounded on the other side of the wall, they fell not quite so far to the front.

This states fairly the evidence in the generous controversy between the two States as to whose troops went farthest to the front at Gettysburg. There was glory enough for all where all did their duty. General Pettigrew himself had his horse killed under him, but continued to advance on foot and was wounded near the wall in his front.

In this historic charge there were "eighteen regiments and one battalion from Virginia, fifteen regiments from North Carolina, three from Mississippi, three from Tennessee, and one regiment and one battalion from Alabama." (Judge Charles M. Cooke, in "Clark's North Carolina Regimental Histories," Vol. III, page 300.)

On the retreat from Gettysburg, when A. P. Hill's Corps crossed the Potomac at Falling Waters, General Pettigrew was placed in charge of the rear guard. A small squad of the enemy's cavalry made a reckless and unexpected charge.

One of the enemy's troopers fired at the General, who fell mortally wounded. The trooper was killed, but the loss which he had caused to the Confederacy was irreparable. General Pettigrew was conveyed to this spot, where, lingering, he died in the early morning on 17 July, 1863.

When he awakened out of his sleep that morning he said: "It is time to be going." He heard the roll call of the Great Commander and answered, "Adsum."

Such is the frief summary of the career of one of the most talented men, one of the bravest spirits that this country has produced.

On the death of Pettigrew it might well have been said in the language of Milton: "Young Lycidas is dead and hath not left his peer."

On the soil of Virginia, which State bore the severest strain of four years of a great war and which saw the fall of so many who died for their duty and their country, there passed away no braver, purer, or more patriotic spirit.

"On Fame's eternal camping ground
His silent tent is spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead."

NOTE.—Pettigrew commanded a front of four brigades, with two brigades in the second line. Pickett cammanded a front of two brigades, with one in the second line—just half as many. Pickett personally (not as a reflection on him, but as a historical fact) stopped at the Cadori House, six hundred yards from the stone wall, and did not cross the Emmettsburg Pike. Pettigrew went forward in person with his command and was wounded near the stone wall. It was, in fact, "Longstreet's assault," being under his command; and the phrase, "Pickett's charge," is a misnomer, due to the fact that the Richmond papers were boosting Pickett for promotion to lieutenant general.—W. THE SHEPARD-PRUDEN MEMORIAL LIBRARY OF EDENTON

By Mrs. Charles P. Wales

On February 2d, 1921, the Shepard-Pruden Memorial Library was thrown open and formally presented to the white people of Edenton and Chowan County. This splendid and fitting memorial is the gift of Mrs. Anne Shepard Graham, daughter of Mr. William Blount Shepard, and the widow and children of Hon. W. D. Pruden, both citizens who held a high place in the affectionate regard of the people, and whose lofty ideals of Christian culture as exemplified in their lives, and now given concrete form and expression in this appropriate tribute to their memory, will not cease to be an inspiration and an influence for good from one generation to another.

Prior to this time a few patriotic citizens of Edenton, realizing that the Cupola House was destined to yield to the commercialism of the times, organized a stock company and purchased the building, and the large banquet hall was assigned to the use of the Shepard-Pruden Memorial Library.

Senator C. S. Vann, on behalf of the donors, fittingly and gracefully presented the library as follows:-

"This library is presented to the white citizens of Edenton and Chowan county by Mrs. Anne Shepard Graham, and widow and children of Mr. W. D. Pruden as a memorial to Mr. William Blount Shepard and Mr. William Dossey Pruden. The sum of ten thousand dollars was given to this memorial. The use of the room is given by the stockholders of the Cupola House. After restoring and furnishing the room, paying one-third of the cost of putting the heating plant in the building, buying the books and supplies for the library, and having the library organized by a trained librarian, $7,500 is left to be invested as a perpetual endowment to buy new books and for other needs of the library.

"It is proposed to have the library directed by a board of five trustees, one to be selected from the town council, one by the board of county commissioners, and three by the stockholders of the Cupola House.

"Now what shall we say about this library? Mr. Carnegie gave many libraries to many cities and towns, but these libraries were so cumbered with cares, and circumscribed by conditions and entangling demands that in many cases, especially in the smaller towns to which these libraries were given, they were liabilities rather than assets. These gifts were in answer to Mr. Carnegie's spirit of philanthropy, and were given without discriminating consideration. Not so with this library, for the distinguished gentlemen who made possible this library grew up with these people, they knew them, knew their tastes and needs, they loved them and this is a gift to the people with whom they moved and whom they loved.

"The gift itself is the best possible that could have been chosen by those who make it. They might have made a gift to the poor and so provided a daily bread line, they might have endowed a hospital where the unfortunate might have had consideration, or they might have given to some other charity, but these are incomparable to the gift of this library. Those would have administered to the needs of a class; this supplies the needs of the whole people; it is free, and those who desire the use of the books of this library can come and get them without money and without price. It is the biggest and best gift that Edenton has yet received. I do not wish to be considered as speaking treason, but it is the truth to say that Edenton has not held its place for culture that our ancestors deeply established and surely maintained. The spirit of commercialism which has played so large a part among the people everywhere of late, has had its effect upon the people of Edenton and so we lost something of our former position as a place of culture. We hope and believe that this gift will have the effect of bringing us back to our former distinction.

"The value of this library upon the tastes and habits of the people cannot be measured if it is received in the spirit in which it is given. We go to the great capital of our great country and stand in the statuary hall and look with admiration upon the figures in stone and bronze of the great men who played their part in our history, but these are but the forms of those who passed away, 'but storied urn, nor animated bust, cannot call back the fleeting breath.' and we feel that we are standing among the things that were and are to be no more. We cross over to the Congressional Library and as we enter we feel a different atmosphere. We are with the things that are and shall be forevermore. It is not necessary that we should be told that we are not to speak above a whisper, the very atmosphere forbids it. We feel now that we are among the living. The ideas and ideals of all the great of all times of every nation are with us. All the stops of our better selves are pulled out and the music of our souls flows out in full volume to mingle with that of our silent and invisible companions. Such is the influence of books, the storehouses of the ideas and ideals of the great of all times, leading us to the best thoughts and to the highest ideals. God be thanked that the distinguished gentlemen of blessed memory have made possible this day, and God be praised that their inheritors have made this possibility a reality. And, now, Mr. Mayor, as the accredited representative of the county of Chowan and town of Edenton, in behalf of those who make this gift, I formally turn it over to you."

For the town and county Mayor E. I. Warren made the speech of acceptance, and said:

"I wish to express my appreciation at being asked to accept such a gracious gift to our town, but I feel lost in finding words to express my real feeling and gratitude for myself and our people. We all feel that this is one of the greatest blessings that will mark the pleasant memories of two of our most distinguished Christian gentlemen. This library will bring to our minds many pleasant recollections of our beloved and honored friends, whose ideas and opinions are still being cherished by our people.

"I desire to express in behalf of our town and community our sincere and grateful appreciation of this admirable gift; it will be the means of a stepping stone to our people for higher and better things. We feel that we owe the relatives of our deceased friends a debt of gratitude for their liberal and generous thought in furnishing this library in memory of William Dossey Pruden and William Blount Shepard, whose pictures we have before us now and whose throbbing hearts would be in love and sympathy with this gathering. Their ideas were strong and uplifting to man, and will be long remembered by those who knew them.

"This will enable every person in our community to enjoy the privilege of a well selected public library that will strengthen and enlighten us to better citizenship; it will teach us to love home and be in sympathy with one another. This would, within itself, be worth more than our banks filled with gold and our bodies bedecked with jewels. I cannot help but feel that in throwing open the doors of such a building as this, which was constructed by our forefathers with such diligence and care and at such great sacrifice, would of itself interest our good people in rallying to its preservation and upkeep; and that the use of this library and the things which may be connected with it, such as local museum, and ladies' tea room, will be to the credit and interest of our town.

"Again I thank the relatives of our beloved friends for their generous gift, and also their friends in helping to secure the building, and their loyal interest in our behalf; and with the love of God I hope and pray that there will be others inspired to such lofty ideas that will pave the way for our people for higher and better ideals.

THE CUPOLA HOUSE AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS

A large portion of the territory of eastern North Carolina was granted by the Crown to the Earl of Granville. The mildness of the climate and fertility of the soil attracted settlers eager to purchase or rent land. It became necessary for Lord Granville to have agents in North Carolina to collect rents and fees and confirm titles, and Francis Corbin and Thomas Child were dispatched to the colony vested with full rights and commissioned as his attorneys. In a few years Child returned to England and left Corbin in full charge. The temptation for self emolument was so great that Corbin set about to extort and impose in every way upon the people. Excessive fees were charged, and surveys and grants to those who had previously purchased land were declared void in order that more fees might be extorted from them. Indignation was aroused all over this section, the courts were appealed to without avail, and Govenor Dobbs was invoked in vain. The citizens became desperate, threatening, even riotous. Corbin had an office in Enfield also, and the people of Halifax and Edgecombe had suffered as well at his hands. They determined to regulate matters by force, and, as the Colonial records recite, the people, "receiving neither redress nor the money unjustly taken from them," early in January, 1759, twenty well armed men set out for Edenton to seek Corbin and compel him to go with them to Enfield. When they reached their destination they obliged Corbin to give security to return at the next term of Court and to return the fees unjustly taken from them. After this the Governor and his Council suspended Corbin and brought the matter to the attention of the Earl of Granville. The action of the Governor was approved and Joshua Bodley was appointed in Corbin's stead. Corbin was dismissed as one of the assistant judges and his commission as colonel of the Chowan regiment was taken from him.

He soon regretted the policy he had pursued and being a man of great shrewdness and ability he seemed afterwards to have gained the respect and confidence of the people who for several terms elected him as a member of the Assembly. He also took a great interest in St. Paul's Church, then nearing completion, declaring that it should be finished.

The Cupola House was built by him for his betrothed, Jean Innes, the widow of Col. James Innes, of the Cape Fear section, the escheator general of North Carolina, and the initials "F. C." and the date "1758" are still plainly visible upon the gable post of this old house.

The house was then very much as it is to-day, with its great outside chimneys, curious old windows, the projecting second story, the beautiful panelled wainscoting; its spacious hall, its quaint winding stairs leading up to the cupola, which was originally surrounded by a delightful balcony overlooking the town and the beautiful waters of Edenton Bay. These old cupolas, or lanterns, as they were originally called, were designed by Sir Christopher Wren and were always lighted up on the King's birthday and public holidays and other festive occasions.

Corbin occupied this residence with his beautiful bride but a short while. She became ill and died. Broken-hearted and crushed, he survived his lovely wife but a few years, and leaving no children, this house descended to his brother and only heir, Edmund Corbin, who sold it to Dr. Samuel Dickinson in 1777, and his great-great-granddaughter in turn sold it in 1918 to the Cupola House Association.

Any one wishing to read further the story of the Cupola House can find it in Dr. Dillard's article in the News and Observer of May 31, 1908.

OPPOSES PLAN FOR REMOVING DUST OF DAVIS' FIRST WIFE*

MISS NANCY DAVIS SMITH RECALLS STAND OF CONFEDERATE LEADER AGAINST DISINTERMENT AND WRITES LOUISIANA DIVISION COMMANDER, U. C. V., ON VETERANS' PROPOSAL

By May E. Robinson (Correspondent)

Shall the handful of dust, which is surely all that remains of the body of Sarah Knox Taylor, first wife of Jefferson Davis, be removed to a new resting place?

The United Confederate Veterans have raised this question, since at the reunion at Houston, Tex., in October, a resolution was passed by that body, and order given to a committee to make this removal from the grave in West Feliciana Parish, La., to one beside her distinguished husband at Richmond, Va.

The proposal is received with mixed feelings by those relatives of the great Confederate leader now resident in West Feliciana Parish and by the people of the parish in general. The proposal, as it reveals a desire to remove from obscurity and to do honor to the dead, is deeply appreciated, but other considerations make it at least debatable. These are best expressed in a letter which Miss Nancy Davis Smith recently wrote to the local paper in West Feliciana, saying:

Opposes Disinterment

"I, as Jefferson Davis' oldest surviving relative and closely associated with him during his declining years, submit the following facts for consideration. Proposing to remove the body of Mr. Davis' first wife from its obscure resting place is, as a tribute to both him and her, worthy of the men who wore the gray, but whether advisable or not becomes a debatable question. Would he whose lips are now sealed have approved?

*From The Times Picayune. Published by request.

"I recall and occasion when, discussing disinterments, he added emphatically, "Where the tree falleth, there shall it lie." A wish that was apparently expressed by the tomb marking his wife's grave. Moreover, four sons buried in different states where they died, were not exhumed while their father lived.

"Another reason for leaving his wife's remains undisturbed is that after 85 years there would seem little probability of identifying a handful of dust.

"To our granduncle, Jefferson Davis we, the descendants of his sister, Mrs. Luther L. Smith, are indebted for foresight in reserving God's acre. The portion enclosed and taken charge of by me, I shall guard during my lifetime, but beyond that, there being no guarantee against desecration, the vision of the grave on a lonely plantation presents a forcible argument for removal. Still there is a solitary argument opposed to the objections I have specified."

(Signed) "NANCY DAVIS SMITH."

WRITES GENERAL BROOKS

Miss Smith has written in similar vein to General O. D. Brooks, Commander Louisiana Division, U. C. V., concluding with this strong paragraph:

"Thus the Veterans' proposed tribute to their revered chief and the wife who was laid to rest eighty-five years ago, would, in fact, though worthily planned, be ignoring his convictions, whose memory they desire to honor."

Miss Smith was a favorite niece of Jefferson Davis and served for years as his amanuensis, and therefore had exceptional opportunities for knowing his opinion on this as well as other subjects. The evidence all points to its being his wish that the grave of the bride of his youth shall remain undisturbed.

The grave of the first Mrs. Jefferson Davis is in the private cemetery of the Luther Smith family, Locust Grove plantation, about six miles from St. Francisville, and is the usual low brick tomb covered with marble slab with an appropriate inscription. This burial plat is reserved for the family and not affected by any subsequent sales.

Was Taylor's Daughter

Mrs. Davis was the daughter of President, at that time Colonel, Zachary Taylor. She married the gallant young Mississippian, then an officer in the United States army, in opposition to the wishes of her father, as he was averse to his daughter's marrying a soldier and being exposed to the discomforts and changes incident to life in army posts. There seems to have been no other objection, and the young couple were determined.

Shortly after their marriage they came to Locust Grove plantation, West Feliciana, to visit his sister, Mrs. Luther Smith. Both developed malarial fever, and as they were dangerously ill, were cared for in seperate rooms.

Jefferson Davis heard his bride singing "Fairy Bells" in her delirium, and struggled to her bedside to find her dying.

She died September 15, 1836, and was buried in the little cemetary at Locust Grove, as young and fair as the flowers that bloomed in profusion there, and for eighty-five years her grave has been lovingly tended by successive generations of the Smith family, and there seems no probability of its being neglected. Mrs. Davis had the distinction of being the daughter of one President and the wife of another, but as she passed away before either father or husband had achieved fame and exalted position, her life-story seems like a separate volume in their respective lives. An exquisite though tragic episode in the life of the great Confederate, closed when the grave opened to receive her eighty-five years ago.

Dear to West Feliciana

It might be fairly inferred that there is where Jefferson

Davis himself would prefer that the beloved wife of his youth should rest until the resurrection morn; it is there that the surviving relatives would wish her to remain, if assured that the grave would be sacred from neglect or desecration; and it is certain that West Feliciana, as a whole, is loath to lose a spot distinguished by such romantic and historic associations.

General A. B. Booth, former commander of Louisiana Division, United Confederate Veterans, has made the suggestion to the U. C. V. committee that instead of removing the remains of Mrs. Davis, that the U. C. V. "might consider buying one hundred square feet (ten feet square) at the grave site, cover the plot with granite, with marble slab in center, with appropriate legend on it." "The parish would," General Booth thinks, "gladly receive it."

This plan is entirely feasible and would, no doubt, satisfy everyone concerned, meeting all requirements of sentiment and common sense, without depriving West Feliciana of a cherished shrine.

JOEL LANE*

A PIONEER AND PATRIOT OF WAKE COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA.

By Marshall DeLancy Haywood

Though comparatively few of the name now remain in the State, the family of Lane was one of the most numerous, as well as influential, in the province of North Carolina. It is said to be collaterally descended from Sir Ralph Lane, who, with Sir Richard Grenville and other bold adventurers, sailed from Plymouth, England, in 1585, and founded (in what is now North Carolina) the Colony of Roanoke, of which Lane became Governor—the first English Governor in America. This colony, as is well known, had no permanent existence, and Governor Lane returned to Great Britian where he died—in Ireland—in 1604, three years prior to the first permanent American settlement, at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607. The father of this Sir Ralph was Sir Ralph Lane of Orlingbury, whose wife, née Parr, was a first cousin of Katherine Parr, the sixth Queen of that exemplary old Mormon, King Henry VIII.

Not many years after Jamestown was founded, several other members of the Lane family came to Virginia, and their descendants aided in the permanent settlement of North Carolina.

This alleged connection between Sir Ralph and the Lanes of Colonial Virginia, from whom spring the Lanes of North Carolina, is vouched for only by tradition, but this tradition exists in many separate and divergent branches of the family. Whether it should be taken cum grano salis, let the reader judge.

> "I cannot tell how the truth may be;
> I say the tale as 'twas said to me."

After removing to North Carolina, the Lanes lived principally in the eastern section of the State. They were useful members of society and adherents to the Church of England. In Halifax County quite a number of the family settled, and there was born JOEL LANE, the subject of this sketch. His father, Joseph Lane, of Halifax, married Patience MacKinne, a daughter of Colonel Barnabas MacKinne.

The above mentioned Joseph Lane, of Halifax (who died about 1776), had five sons, all of whom left issue. They were: Joel, of whom this sketch will treat at length; Joseph,* who married Ferebee Hunter, and died in Wake County in 1798; James,† who married Lydia Speight, and died in Wake County on January 6, 1805; Jesse,‡ who married Winifred Aycock, and died in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1804; and Barnabas, who died about 1775. Barnabas had three children: Martin, Barnabas (Jr.) and a daughter, Jean. His son Martin—born 1755, died 1825—served in the Revolutionary War, was one of the earliest land-owners in Raleigh, and died in Giles County, Tennessee, leaving descendants.

General Joseph Lane, the "Marion of the Mexican War," who was Governor of Oregon and United States Senator,

*Joseph left a son and grand son, both named Joseph. They should not be confused with General Joseph Lane, of Oregon, who, as hereinafter mentioned, was a grandson of Jesse Lane.

†There seems to have been a superfluity of James Lanes: (1) James Sr., above mentioned—Col. Joel's brother; (2) James, son of Col. Joel; (3) James, son of another Joel, and granlson of James, Sr. I think there were some Lanes in other parts of the State, who also bore this given name.

‡In the State Records, Vol. XVI., p. 1101, it appears that a Jesse Lane enlisted for a three years term of service on March 1, 1777, in Captain Jacob Turner's Company, Third North Carolina Continentals. Captain Turner was killed at the battle of Germantown in the following October. After Jesse's enlistment had expired, he again entered the service; for by reference to the manuscript books, entitled "Army Accounts," in the rooms of the North Carolina Historical Commission at Raleigh, Vol. 13, Section A. A., p. 50, will be found the entry: "Allowed Jesse Lane for pay to the first of January, 1782, including interest, the first day of August, 1783——175. 11. 6." Governor Swain in the letter presently given, says that Jesse moved to Georgia before this (in 1779). Quere: Were there two Jesses, or did Jesse of Wake send his family to georgia, and follow them later?

as well as a distinguished soldier, was the son of John Lane and his wife Betsy Street. This John was a son of Jesse and a nephew of Joel.

When General Lane was a candidate for Vice President of the United States in 1860, he visited Raleigh in July of that year and was entertained at the country seat of his kinsman, the late Henry Mordecai, just north of the city. To this entertainment every member of the Lane connection, who could be found, was invited. Mr. Mordecai's residence was originally built by his grandfather, Henry Lane, eldest son of Joel; but afterwards, in 1824, was added to and remodeled under the supervision of William Nichols, who also altered the architecture of the old capitol, which was destroyed by fire on the 21st of June, 1831.

It has sometimes been stated that the late Governor Henry Smith Lane, of Indiana, was descended from the Lanes of Wake County. This, as the writer learns from a member of the family in Indiana, is a mistake; though the Governor was probably of the same stock, for his ancestors were of Virginia origin, as were also the Lanes of North Carolina.

After General Joseph Lane, of Oregon, had won a great reputation in the War with Mexico and was gaining distinction in national politics, a gentleman in Tennessee, desiring to know something of the history of the Lane family, wrote in 1859 to ex-Governor Swain (then President of the University of North Carolina, and a first cousin of the General), for the information desired. Governor Swain's reply was published in the Memphis Avalanche, and was afterwards copied in the North Carolina Semi-Weekly Standard, a paper published at Raleigh, in its issue of July 21, 1860, when Lane was a candidate for Vice President. Commenting upon it, the editor of the Standard observed that in Buncombe County where General Lane was born, there was a "Lane's Pinnacle," a "Lane's Mine Hole Gap," and "Lane's Iron Works," named for his family.

The letter of Governor Swain is so replete with information concerning the whole connection that we give it in full:

CHAPEL HILL, October 23rd, 1859.

Dear Sir:—Your letter of the 14th, owing to my absence in the discharge of official duties, did not reach me until a day or two since, and I avail myself of the earliest practicable opportunity to reply.

There is probably no family whose authentic history can be more clearly traced through every period of the annals of North Carolina than that of General Lane's. In proportion to numbers, comparatively few of its members have aspired to or obtained political distinction, or indeed distinction of any kind. On the other hand there are probably few that have enjoyed greater average respectability.

General Lane's great-grandfather, Joseph (who signed his name Joseph Lane, Jr., in 1727), died at his residence near Halifax, on the Roanoke, in 1776. His three sons—Joel, Joseph, and Jesse—were pioneer settlers in the neighborhood of Raleigh, in 1741. Of these, Colonel Joel was the wealthiest and most conspicuous. He conveyed to the State 640* acres of land; the site of the phesent City of Raleigh. His dwelling-house, at the period of its erection the best within a hundred miles, is the present residence of William Boylan, Esq. All three were Whigs during the Revolution, and Colonel Joel and Jesse did service in the army, the latter as a private†.

Jesse was the grandfather of General Joseph Lane and of myself. He was born in Halifax, July 4, 1733, and married Winifred Aycock. They had sixteen children–eight sons and eight daughters–all of whom lived to rear families. In 1779 my grandfather emigrated to Wilkes, now Oglethorpe County, Ga., where he resided until 1800; then he removed to St. Louis, where he died in 1804.

General Lane is the son of Joel Lane, the eighth child and fourth son of our grandfather Jesse. At the time of the removal of the family to Georgia (1779), Wilkes was a frontier county, and, during a series of years was subject to frequent incursions from the Creeks and Cherokees. There were no members of the family able to bear arms, whose services were not put into requisition, and no one male, or female who were not familiar with the horror of savage warfare. My mother beguiled many an hour during my infancy, in the recital of hairbreadth escapes, which, delicate woman as she was, rendered her personal history one of remarkable suffering and adventure.

I have no recollection of my grandfather or uncle John. The former visited my father on his way to Missouri, and the latter was an inmate of our family for some time previous to and subsequent to my birth. I heard much about him in my boyhood, and suppose that

*At a later date, 1867, Governor Swain makes a more accurate statement (in his Tucker Hall Address) of the amount of land sold by Lane, to-wit: 1,000 acres, 400 acres of which were laid off into lots and the remainder held, for the time being, by the State.—M. DEL. H.

†See last note on p. 36, ante.—M. DEL. H.

in all respects the son is the counterpart of the father, brave enterprising, and generous. He was a universal favorite in the midst of the men who fought at the Cowpens and King's Mountain, and who considered a foray among the Indians as little less than a pastime.

General Lane's mother was Betsy, daughter of James Street, the first sheriff of my native county (Buncombe). The descendants of the sixteen children of Jesse are dispersed through all of the Western and Southern States.

I enter into these particulars simply to satisfy you that whilst the family of General Lane have no just pretentions to the pride of heraldry, there is no cause, on the other hand, why they should blush for his ancestry or his connections.

I write in unavoidable haste, but will be ready at any time to communicate more special information if it is called for.

Yours very respectfully,

D. L. SWAIN.

Many years before Wake County was formed, Joel Lane had settled at the point which afterwards became its county-seat, and was later the capital of the State. His place of residence was at a cross-roads hamlet called Bloomsbury, and was then within the territory of Johnston County. Land was taken from Orange and Cumberland, as well as Johnston, for the formation of Wake, and Mr. Lane was one of the commissioners who laid out its boundaries. The new county was established by the colonial assembly in December, 1770, with a proviso that the act of creation should not take effect until March 12, 1771. Governor Tryon, for whose wife, née Wake—and not "Esther Wake"—it was named, formally signed the charter on May 22, in the latter year.*

The first court was held on the 4th of June, 1771. Theophilus Hunter was chairman, and Joel Lane and his brother Joseph were among the members of this tribunal.† The other justices were: Benjamin Hardy, James Martin, Hardy Sanders, Abraham Hill, Thomas Wootten, James Jones, Tingnall Jones and Thomas Crawford.

In the early spring of 1771, when Governor Tryon raised an army to suppress the insurrection of the Regulators, the principal place of rendezvous for his forces was Bloomsbury or Wake Court House, where Raleigh now stands. Colonel John Hinton, Lane's father-in-law, then commanded the county militia and marched under Tryon to the scene of action, in which he bore a conspicuous part.* Of Colonel Hinton's conduct on this occasion, and afterwards at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, during the Revolution, Governor Caswell says: "In both instances I was an eye-witness and can venture to assert he behaved with becoming bravery and resolution."† At Alamance the Regulators were routed in the battle fought on May 16, 1771. While waiting for reenforcements during that campaign, Governor Tryon located his headquarters near the present Fayetteville road at Hunter's Lodge, the residence of Theophilus Hunter. This was some distance southeast of Spring Hill, later the home of Theophilus Hunter, Jr. For three days, from the 5th to the 8th of May, the army remained there. As the old road was too rough to carry artillery over, Tryon had a new one cut in the direction of the Regulators' country. After a town in Kent, England, he called it "Ramsgate Road." That classic locality near Raleigh, now known as Ramcat, derives its name from this circumstance. When the army marched back from Alamance, Colonel Hinton's detachment was disbanded at Wake Court-House on the 22nd of June. On the day before this, Governor Tryon bade his army farewell, and left for New York, having been appointed Governor of that Province.† He was succeeded, as Governor of North Carolina, by Josiah Martin, who remained in office until driven out during the Revolution. Whether Joel Lane served in the Alamance campaign is not known, but he probably did, for his name appears as Lieutenant-Colonel of Colonel Hinton's Regiment on a roster made out in 1772.‖

For many years Colonel Lane was a Justice of the County Court of Wake; and during the war for Independence, he was at one time its Presiding Justice.* Throughout the entire conflict with Great Britian, he served with fidelity in many important civil stations. Together with John Hinton, Michael Rogers, Theophilus Hunter, Tingnall Jones†, John Rand, and Thomas Hines, he represented Wake County in the Provincial Congress at Hillsborough in August, 1775, and that body, on September 9th elected him a member of the Committee of Safety for the Hillsborough District.‡ John Hinton and Michael Rogers were likewise elected members of this committee. On September 9, 1775, the above named Congress also elected militia officers for Wake County as follows: John Hinton, Colonel; Theophilus Hunter, Lieutenant-Colonel; John Hinton, Jr., First Major; and Thomas Hines, Second Major. When the militia was reorganized, on April 22, 1776, these officers were continued in the same rank.||

Michael Rogers succeeded Hunter in 1778; for, by the minute docket of the Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions in that year, it appears that on the 19th of February, "Michael Rogers, Esq., produced into Court a commission from His Excellency Richard Caswell, Esq., Governor, constituting him Lieutenant Colonel for the County of Wake; came into Court and qualifyed agreeable to law." Hardy Sanders likewise held that rank at a later period, and James Hinton was either a Colonel or a Lieutenant Colonel.

In the Provincial Congress which assembled at Halifax in April, 1776, Colonel Lane again represented Wake County.§ His colleagues in this body were John Hinton, John Rand, Tingnall Jones, and William Hooper. The last named, though put down as a delegate from Wake, was not a resident of the county, but came from the eastern part of the state. He was one of those who, a few months later, made their names immortal by signing the Declaration of Independence at Philidelphia. While a member of this Provincial Congress, Mr. Hooper was also a member of the Continental Congress.

Colonel Lane did not serve in the Provincial Congress which met at Halifax in November, 1776. The delegates from Wake County were Tingnall Jones, Michael Rogers, James Jones, Britain Fuller, and John Rice.*

From February, 1778, to September, 1778, Joel Lane was Entry Taker†, and frequently represented Wake County in the State Senate. At that time the Legislature met annually, and sometimes oftener. During the Revolution, James Jones was the first to hold the office of Senator, in 1777. At the second session of 1777, in 1778, and in 1781 Michael Rogers was Senator. John Rand was Senator in 1779, and John Hinton in 1780. During and after the war, Colonel Lane was eleven times Senator—in 1782, 1783, two sessions in 1784, 1787, 1788, 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, and 1794.

Those who represented Wake County in the House of Commons during the Revolution were: John Rand, Tingnall Jones, Lodowick Alford, John Rice, Thomas Wootten, Thomas Hines, John Hinton, Jr., Nathaniel Jones,‡ (of White Plains), John Humphries, Burwell Pope, James Hinton, Theophilus Hunter, and Hardy Sanders.

On June 23, 1781, while the war was raging with its greatest fury, the Legislature met at Wake Court House.|| For want of more commodious edifice, Colonel Lane's residence was used as the place for assembling. At this session, Thomas Burke was elected to succeed Abner Nash as Governor.

P. for White Plains, after their names.

A ludricrous reminder of the depreciation in paper currency caused by the gloomy prospects for the success of the Lane was paid for the house-rent, pasturage for horses, etc., American cause, is the official record* that when Colonel used by the above Legislature during this session of less than one month's duration, the amount voted him was fifteen thousand pounds! or about thirty thousand dollars (a pound was then only two dollars). This was many times as great as the sum paid by the State for the Lane plantation (where Raleigh is built) after the war, when money was worth more than the paper it was printed on.

During the Revolution those who occupied the office of High Sheriff of Wake (then a station of great importance) were: Thomas Hines, from June, 1775, till June, 1777; Thomas Wootten, from June, 1777, till September, 1780; Hardy Sanders, from September, 1780, till September, 1782; Britain Sanders, from September, 1782, until after peace was declared.†

After the end of hostilities, Colonel Lane exerted every effort to allay the bitterness which had arisen while the war was in progress, and befriended many Loyalists who were objects of hatred to a less generous element of the Whigs than that to which he belonged. Among other Tories, who had reason to be thankful for his good offices, was Colonel John Hamilton, whom he probably knew before the war, as both were from Halifax County. Hamilton was one of the bravest and most active officers siding with the King, and a man of character who had treated American prisoners with more than ordinary kindness, though even this did not save his estates from confiscation. For some years after the Revolution, he was British consul at Norfolk, Virginia, and finally went to England, where he died. Serving on Hamilton's staff was a young ensign, Dugald McKethen, who became a useful and respected citizen of Raleigh after the return of peace, and married one of Colonel Lane's daughters.

In the time treated by this sketch, Wake County abounded in large game, and hunting was a favorite pastime. Just inside, and westward of the southern entrance, of Capitol Square in Raleigh, there is still living a large sassafras tree, which was a famous deer-stand. The writer learned this from his father, the late Dr. Richard B. Haywood, who personally remembered one of Colonel Lane's relatives, Edmund Lane, who himself claimed to have killed nearly forty deer there.

Before the Revolutionary War, and during that struggle, the capital of North Carolina was somewhat migratory. It was, as a rule, located where the Governor happened to reside, for that functionary usually summoned the Legislature to meet at the place which best suited his convenience. So, after independence had been achieved, the State Convention, which met in Fayetteville in 1788, gave the General Assembly instructions to fix permanently the capital, provided it should be within ten miles of Isaac Hunter's plantation in Wake County, which radius was chosen on account of its central location. Nine commissioners were appointed to purchase a site, but only six attended a meeting held for that purpose. Those present were: Frederick Hargett, Chairman, William Johnston Dawson, Joseph McDowell, James Martin, Thomas Blount, and Willie Jones. The members of this board were from different parts of the State. They had to choose from seventeen tracts which were offered. In reference to their decision, the Honorable Kemp P. Battle, in his 1892 Centennial Address on Raleigh, says that the Hinton tract on Neuse river received, on the first ballot, three of the six votes cast; the tract offered by Joel Lane received two; and the other vote was cast for land owned by Nathaniel Jones, of White Plains, near the present village of Cary. As a majority was not received by either tract on this ballot, the board adjourned until next day. Continuing his address Dr. Battle says:

"Willie Jones was a master of the art of persuasion and was an intimate friend of Joel Lane. Lane himself was a man of influence, who had served the State in the Colonial Congress and as Senator for ten years in succession. Very probably he offered new inducements as to price. At any rate, on Friday, the 30th of March, a second ballot was taken, with the result that Wake Court House received five votes, and the Hinton land received only one vote. Possibly Lane was adversely criticised for his tactics in winning the contest. There was abundant room for unpleasant talk on account of his entertaining the Commissioners at his house. They were acting as judges, and were certainly, notwithstanding their high character, liable to the criticism that they ate the bread of one of the litigants. I cannot find their accounts of expenses, but it is altogether probable that they paid for their entertainment. I notice that Lane was Senator from 1782 to 1792, both inclusive, but that in the next year James Hinton had his place. This is some evidence that the Hinton family resented his success in the negotiation and that the people took their side. If so, the displeasure was evanescent, for he was Senator again in 1794 and 1795."

James Iredell (afterwards a Judge of the United States Supreme Court) introduced the Convention ordinance requiring the capital to be located in Wake County, and the name "Raleigh"' is said to have been first suggested for the new city by Governor Alexander Martin.

As Colonel Lane's residence was the most important house at Bloomsbury, or Wake Cross Roads, before Raleigh was laid out, he was often inconvenienced by the number of travellers who claimed his hospitality. To get rid of those who were not his personal friends, he caused to be erected a small ordinary—or or'nary as it was called by the natives. This old inn was afterwards turned into a school-house, and later used as an out-building to a residence on the north side of Hillsborough street, between McDowell and Dawson. It was about three-quarters of a mile in an easterly direction from the old Lane homestead, and somewhat resembled the architecture of that building. It was finally torn down.

Two blocks north of Capitol Square, in Raleigh, one of the city's thoroughfares, running east and west, is called Lane street in honor of the former owner of the soil.

Colonel Lane was one of the first trustees of the University of North Carolina, and (on November 5, 1792) offered that institution a gift of six hundred and forty acres of land, near the plantation of Nathaniel Jones, of White Plains, on condition that it should be located there, but the offer was declined.

Hinton James, the first graduate of the University, was a nephew of Mrs. Lane, whose father, Colonel John Hinton, had two daughters who married members of the James family. Hinton James was the son of Captain John James, of the Revolution, and his wife, Alice Hinton. Alice's sister, Elizabeth, married Thomas James.

Colonel Lane was twice married. Both of his wives were daughters of the well known Revolutionary soldier and statesman, Colonel John Hinton, of Wake County, and his wife, Grizelle Kimbrough.

To his first wife, MARTHA HINTON, Colonel Lane was married on the 9th of December, 1762. She died on September 9, 1771, leaving three sons. They were:

I. Henry Lane, born March 6, 1764, who married his first cousin, Mary Hinton (daughter of Major John Hinton, Jr., of Wake County), and left descendants. He died in Wake County in 1797.

II. James Lane, who was born October 7, 1766.*

III. William Lane, who was born October 15, 1768.*

MARY HINTON, the second wife of Joel Lane, to whom

*Where the marriages of Colonel Lane's children are not given, it is because I have been unable to ascertain whom they married. Some of his children may have died young. James and William were living in 1794 when their father made his will. As to other James Lanes, see second note, page 36, ante.

he was married in 1772, bore him nine children as follows:

I. Nancy Lane, born July 22, 1773.

II. John Lane, born March 6, 1775, who married Sarah Elizabeth Jones, daughter of Nathaniel Jones, of White Plains, Wake County, and left descendants. He removed to Marshall County, Tennessee, and died there in 1864.

III. Martha Lane, born February 19, 1778, who was twice married: (first), to Dugald McKethen, heretofore mentioned; (second), to Jonathan Brickell. She was Mr. Brickell's second wife. Her death occured in Raleigh, May 20, 1852. She had children, but no descendants are now living.

IV. Elizabeth Lane, born August 6, 1780, who was the first wife of Stephen Haywood, of Raleigh, where she died March 7, 1805. She has descendants, but none are now living who bear the name of Haywood.

V. Mary Lane, born January 1, 1783.

VI. Thomas Lane, born September 12, 1785, who married Nancy Lane, daughter of his cousin and guardian, Martin Lane, heretofore mentioned. Thomas removed to Giles County, Tennessee, and died there March 29, 1832, leaving issue.

VII. Dorothy Lane, born December 13, 1787, who was the second wife of Dr. Allen W. Gilchrist, and left descendants. Her marriage took place on May 29, 1806. Dr. Gilchrist was from Halifax County, North Carolina, but afterwards removed from the State.

VIII. Joel Hinton Lane, born October 11, 1790, who married Mary Freeman, and died without issue, in Giles County, Tennessee, June 22, 1832. He was a volunteer from Wake County, North Carolina, in the War of 1812.

IX. Grizelle Lane, born June 13, 1793, who married George Lillington Ryan, and died without issue, in Raleigh, March 4, 1868.

Joel Lane's second wife Mary survived him less than a week, and died on the 3d of April, 1795.

In things spiritual, Colonel Lane was most exemplary, and enforced strict religious observance upon all within his household. It has been noted that his ancestors were adherents of the Church of England; so, when this sturdy pioneer came to the wilds of Wake County, the Book of Common Prayer came also. Under the English Church Establishment at that time, the territory embraced in Wake was known as the "Parish of St. Margaret." Though the adjacent country was too thinly settled for the Church to thrive, the Lane residence always remained the home of religion as well as of hospitality. Not only was the family called daily to prayer, but Colonel Lane himself observed each fast and other devotional exercise prescribed by the Church, in which he remained a communicant up to the time of his death. At intervals, some regularly ordained clergyman would pass through; and on these occasions, younger members of the family were baptized. Among other clerical visitors, was Parson Meikeljohn, of Hillsborough, whom "Shocco" Jones describes as "a high Church-man in religion and a high Tory in politics." When, some years after the Revolution, Bishop Ravenscroft came to Wake County to revive, under its new name, the Church of England, the Lanes could boast that in one quarter, at least, it had never been dormant.

The death of Joel Lane occured on the 29th day of March, 1795. In an address delivered in Raleigh, on August 24, 1867, Ex-Governor Swain (Colonel Lane's great-nephew) refers to the last resting place of the old patriot, saying that his remains "moulder in the midst of other unrecorded dead beneath the shade of a mulberry on his ancient domain." There, indeed, is his grave, of which no vestige now appears. The spot has a cottage built over it, and lies a few feet east of Boylan Avenue, about thirty-five yards south of Morgan street.

After the death of Joel Lane, his son Thomas, to whom he bequeathed his residence, sold it on December 31, 1808, to Dr. Allen W. Gilchrist who married Colonel Lane's daughter. It was afterwards bought by Peter Browne, a native of Scotland, who was an able lawyer, but withal a miser and utilitarian, respecting nothing above its value in dollars and cents. Finding that the burying ground (where, also, many other early citizens, besides the Lanes, were interred) was an unprofitable piece of property, he had it plowed up and planted in cabbages! If one leaves this spot, and walks about a mile and a half eastward along Morgan Street to what Raleigh people now call the Old Graveyard, there he will find the slab which marks the grave of Browne himself. It states that he died October 26, 1833, "aged 6711 years." Verily, one may think, Methuselah would turn green with envy, and feel youthful, could he read this. What means it, may be asked by another, less credulous. The solution is this: Originally the inscription read, "67" years; and some vandal, with a good knowledge of stone-cutting, did the rest by adding the two other figures. Thus the grave of this desecrator has not itself escaped desecration.

Before concluding our sketch, further mention should be made of the house in which Colonel Lane lived, and which was built by him. It still stands, and is the oldest house in Raleigh—much older than the city itself. William Boylan, editor of the Minerva, bought it from the aforementioned Peter Browne, in 1818, and it has been in possession of the Boylans ever since. It faced east on the avenue named for that family, but was later moved westward a few hundred yards and is now on Hargett Street, facing south. To one of the present generation, it is an unimposing structure; but when built, was considered quite palatial. Two stories, low in pitch, with a steep double-slanting roof, is the house as it stands. But it seldom fails to attract attention. Its quaintness of architecture speaks of a generation now passed into history—of Tryon, marching with his army against the Regulators; of Burke, Spaight, Lenoir, and their compat-

"A kind of old Hobgoblin Hall,
Now somewhat fallen to decay,
With weather-stains upon the wall,
And stairways worn and crazy doors,
And creaking and uneven floors,
And chimneys huge, and tiled and tall—
A region of repose it seems,
A place of slumber and of dreams!"

THE SPIRIT OF THE REVOLUTION

By Mary Hilliard Hinton

The American Revolution may easily be classed as one of the most remarkable events of modern history, the fruits of which have so affected the world.

As late as 1774 America found the melting pot had performed its task well. The conglomeration of nationalities had become consolidated as one, the Anglo-Saxon predominating.

To the wealthy American families of English descent the ties with the mother-country were as close as geographical conditions could permit. The life they led in the Colonies was influenced by the English mode of living. Their children, trained in the schools and colleges of Britain, returned to the New World to cherish the same manners and customs. This made severance of the bonds that bound them to home all the more difficult.

The masses, struggling for existence, were less controlled by such influences, and furnished more fertile soil for the germination of democracy. Strange to say, the masses of the Revolutionary period were better informed than are the masses of the Union to-day with all its boasted progress and culture. With no magazines, traveling or public libraries, no public schools, passable roads, or railroads, no telegraph or telephone, no movies, no innumerable daily papers, with weekly mail in summer and fortnightly in winter, all of which bring the world to our very doors, it is astounding that the people of that day were so conversant with current events and knew the needs of the hour. They did their own thinking—a habit that is in danger of becoming obsolete.

With the classes the Anglo-Saxon thirst for justice, the inherent demand for freedom and the call of liberty, which have ever characterized the race, were just as pronounced then as at Runnymede.

The most vital issue that can touch the human side of man is taxation, and when representation is denied, another almost equally vital question is involved. Taxation and the electorate are the strongest of the three pillars of democracy. Hence, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney's declaration "Millions for defence, but not one cent tribute," was an echo of the feelings of the Colonists.

These sentiments they were fully prepared to support with arms. Men who owned their own land, raised all supplies, all material for the clothing, which was made in the homes, feared neither government nor ruler. They were not concerned with high nor low tariff, and could subsist were all ports closed. They were absolutely independent and paid court to no one, but were governed by the lofty motive of principle only, instead of such a fleeting fancy as "political expediency." The fight was against an imbecile German king and not against the English people.

Scattered along a distance of 1,500 miles, 3,000,000 souls, with a small minority of Tories in their midst, murmured against the injustice of the wrongs imposed by the Crown, and asserted their rights.

The selection of Washington as Commander-in-Chief of the Army was the highest tribute, for even at that time there was a feeling existing between the North and the South. It was a proof that he was worthy of the trust and showed the keen insight of those leaders by whom he was chosen. Time has revealed the truth that he was born for the service of his country. The wealthiest man of America of his day, he risked all and obeyed solely the voice of duty, actuated by principle, even though before him loomed up the sad fate of that other rebel, the unfortunate Nathaniel Bacon who, striking too soon, failed. Thru victory and defeat Washington was ever the calm leader with the resolve to fight to a brilliant triumph, or a glorious death. His words, "I have put my hand to the plow and cannot turn back," were characteristic of the man who, although he regarded the result as uncertain, would be faithful to the end. Charles Carroll on entering the strife realized ultimate failure possible and signed his full name, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, to the Declaration of Independence in order that another Charles Carroll might not be accorded a rebel's fate.

Although the infidel principles of France permeated that period, a deep religious faith pervaded the Revolution. In Virginia the patriots severed connection with the mother-country with the most solemn forms of religion. When the Assembly met at Williamsburg May 24, 1774, the members "resolved to set apart a day for fasting, humiliation and prayer."

The letter of George Mason of "Gunston Hall," the friend of Washington, who was present at that Assembly but not a delegate, in which he alludes to that resolution, shows the deep religious sentiment of the patriot. Col. Mason wrote:

"Enclosed you have the Boston Trade Act and a resolve of our House of Burgesses. You will observe that it is confined to the members of their own House; but they would wish to see the example followed through the country; for which purpose the members, at their own private expense, are sending expresses with the resolve to their respective counties. Mr. Massie (the minister of Fairfax) will receive a copy of the resolve from Colonel Washington; and should a day of prayer and fasting be appointed in our county, please to tell my dear little family that I charge them to pay a strict attention to it, and that I desire my three eldest sons and my two oldest daughters may attend church in mourning, if they have it, as I believe they have."

Several years later in 1778, the American Congress went further than appointing a day of fasting and prayer and passed the following resolution regulating morals:

"Whereas, true religion and good morals are the only solid foundation of public liberty and happiness: Resolved, that it be, hereby, earnestly recommended to the several States, to take the most effectual measures for the encouragement thereof, and for the suppressing of theatrical entertainments, horse-racing, and gaming, and such other diversions as are productive of idleness, dissipation, and a general depravity of manners."

In Pennsylvania Washington's faith in and dependence on prayer is emphasized. During the darkest hour of that trying winter at Valley Forge he was seen kneeling alone in prayer in a secluded wood. From that day the fortunes of the Patriot Army grew brighter. The beautiful Memorial Chapel erected on the spot where our Chieftain knelt has been remembered by our leading patriotic organizations with handsome gifts.

A notable example of piety was Mrs. Van Cortlandt, of Van Cortlandt Manor on the Hudson, who knelt in prayer by a bed in her room the entire day the Battle of White Plains was fought, from the first booming of the cannon at sunrise, till the sun sank below the horizon, praying for the victory of the American arms and the safety of her sons engaged in the battle.

The record of the Red Cross, thoroughly organized during the World War, has been a marvel and leaves nothing to be desired. What did our foremothers accomplish in this line during the Revolution? In Townsend, Massachusetts, a mother and her daughters during a day and a night sheared a black and a white sheep, carded from the fleece a gray wool, which they spun, wove, and cut and made into a suit of clothes for a boy to wear off to fight for liberty. In the summer of 1775 when the preparations for the war were in a most unsettled and depressing condition, particularly the supplies for the Continental Army, the Provincial Congress called upon the people to supply thirteen thousand warm coats by cold weather. No contractors existed then to meet this demand, but by hundreds and hundreds of firesides throughout the country wool-wheels and hand-looms were set to work and the patriotic women of America gave their handiwork eagerly. To-day the record books of some New England towns preserve the names of these coat-makers. To each soldier volunteering for eight months service one of these home-spun, home-made, all-wool coats was presented "as a bounty," which was highly prized; so much so that the heirs of the heroes who fell at Bunker Hill before receiving their coats were paid a sum of money instead. A list of the names of the soldiers who were given a bounty was known as the "Coat Roll." By the English Washington's troops were sneeringly nicknamed "Homes spuns."

The patriots of '76 took no account of consequences but risked all, and in some instances contributed so freely as to leave their families impoverished. Such was the case of General Thomas Nelson, who gave his entire fortune—hundreds of thousands—for the Patriot cause, leaving his widow and children almost destitute. As I stood by his grave in the churchyard at Yorktown, which had remained unmarked for more than a century, naturally thoughts dwelt upon the ingratitude of the country for patriotic sacrifice. He procured on his own credit for the use of his State when Virginia could procure none on her own. He entered the conflict very rich, but at his death, "save the old home in deserted York and some poor, broom-straw fields in Hanover," his property was sold at public sale to pay debts assumed for his country. Even the old family Bible with the records of the Nelsons, with the little table that held it, was sold at that time.

Governor John Page furnished another example of unselfish devotion when he stripped the heavy lead covering from the shingled roof of his home, "Rosewell," considered the stateliest mansion in Virginia, "when Colonial Virginia was baronial Virginia," to be moulded into bullets for the Army. Robert Morris of Pennsylvania was the acknowledged financier of the Revolution. The gift of Elizabeth Maxwell Steele of Salisbury to General Greene, the gold saved from years of toil, affords another illustration of patriotic sacrifice.

Lastly our patriots of '76 possessed vision, safeguarded by wisdom and judgment. That period produced a very rare type—constitution builders, statesmen—who have handed down to us the most priceless heritage, a document of such worth that it has been most conscientiously protected against the 2,203 propositions for amendment introduced in Congress, nineteen winning, and then only during times of great public disaster.

A devoted son of Britain once remarked that he was thankful the ties were severed so early, for then the loss was less. By adhering strictly to the dictates of principles the offspring has later saved the mother country, as well as the world.

IN MEMORIAM

MRS. ELLEN TYSON LEE

Again the summons to lay aside the duties earth and ascend to the glory of a higher sphere has come to one of our faithful officers, leaving a shadow that cannot be lifted, for in this loss we have sustained a very heavy blow. In all the varied services Ellen Tyson Lee rendered the Daughters of the Revolution, there was displayed a marked degree of efficiency that performed each task with entire satisfaction, a high sense of loyalty and patriotism that could not be surpassed, and poise that bespoke the inherited Spartan spirit of Revolutionary ancestors. The worthy sister of a distinguished general, the mother of a soldier, she was a true patriot indeed. Of her it can be said she was absolutely dependable, praise that can be accorded few. To the Regent she was ever a staunch supporter, a tower of strength, who never failed to respond to every call. Words cannot convey the extent of our loss, which will extend through coming years. May others emulate her noble example. Faithful to every trust, duty was her watchword.

To the bereaved family we extend our warmest sympathy.

That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Society and a copy sent to the family.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. ELLEN TYSON LEE, WHO DIED NOVEMBER, 1920

WHEREAS, God in his tender, divine love and wisdom has seen it was well to call from our midst to the Spirit World our beloved Chapter Regent, Mrs. Ellen Tyson Lee, therefore, be it Resolved, that the Bloomsbury Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, deplores this inexpressible loss.

That her zeal, generosity, never-tiring energy for our interests, even when fettered by physical disability, trustworthiness, reserve—never seeking but always sought—and keen appreciation of the fundamental principles that made our country great, made serving with and under her leadership a joyous privilege.

That we shall miss her inspirational influence, but bow in humble submission to the decree of a Higher Power.

To her loved ones we tender our sincere sympathy.

That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Society and a copy sent to the family.

REVIEW OF THE CONQUEST OF THE OLD SOUTHWEST

By Nina Holland Covington
(Mrs. Laurence Covington)

The history of North Carolina, tinged throughout with the glamour of romance, has no more thrilling chapter than the story of the adventures of the daring and dauntless pioneers who left the State to establish settlements beyond the mountains in Kentucky and Tennessee. This story is most graphically told in "The Conquest of the Old Southwest," by Dr. Archibald Henderson, of the University of North Carolina. Dr. Henderson is well known as an accurate, clear-visioned historian; moreover, being a member of the family who sent out these early settlers under Daniel Boone, he had the added advantage of unlimited access to family documents and records which throw light upon this important period of American history.

"It is," one critic says, "a notable, authoritative contribution to the history of the Old Southwest, written in a lively, vivid style, with a wealth of romantic incidents, absolutely authentic and based upon documentary evidence, and replete with extracts from original letters, journals, and diaries hitherto unpublished or inaccessible."

The choice of title of the book indicates the exact section of the country with which it deals. "By West nowadays we mean the regions on the western side of the Mississippi, but at this early date when most of settled America was along the fringe of the Atlantic, the Carolinas, Kentucky and Tennessee, were called the Southwest. The fearless, resourceful, devoted men and women who first went West not only led the way for those who later crossed the Mississippi, but they struck the keynote of that pioneer civilization which has so profoundly influenced the character of the American people by shaping our Democracy, the democracy which produced an Andrew Jackson and an Abraham Lincoln."

By means of the story of the settlers of this old Southwest, with all the attendant hardships and dangers, the historian develops and describes the great and powerful idea of Westward Expansion, the idea which drove men from their peaceful homes in the thickly settled portion of the country to dare unknown dangers, to withstand savage enemies and finally to make settlements in a strange and rough and rugged country.

"Some to endure and many to fail,
Some to conquer and many to quail,
Toiling over the Wilderness Trail."

With painstaking, yet interesting detail, Dr. Henderson tells the story of the German settlements in Pennsylvania, of the early trading paths established by these settlers with their Southern neighbors, with, finally, the migration of many of these to Virginia and Carolina; of the early history of the Boone family and other early settlers.

Governors who helped in pioneer settlement, governors how retarded westward expansion, treaties of peace with Indian nations, the romantic hunting stories of the hunters in the Cumberland and elsewhere, all is told with skill and accuracy. Especially well does he tell of these early hunters, who, though not as serious-minded as the home-makers, nevertheless, opened the way, explored the forest and made the men who followed them feel that what other men had dared they, too, could and would dare. Thus, the wedge of pioneer settlement pushed on and on into the obscurity of the dense forests. In the midst of struggles with the Indians (fighting as they were against the encroachment of the white man), in the midst of revolts against tyrannical oppression of governors and kings, the ax of the early settler cut down the trees of the dense forest, until immense tracts of land were opened up, settlements became permanent, men of broad vision established companies for systematic settlement. Finally, the "Old Southwest" became an important section of the young American nation.

Such is the main theme of the book by Dr. Henderson. It is perhaps one of the most important contributions to American history of the last decade. It is a matter of great pride to North Carolinians that the book has been enthusiastically praised by some of the greatest historians and critics of the country. It is a matter of distinct congratulation that Dr. Henderson's loyalty to his state makes him satisfied to remain in his "ain countree" in spite of flattering inducements offered elsewhere, and above all, we are intensely indebted to him that he has so often directed his genius upon subjects relating to his own State. Thus North Carolina history is most wonderfully enriched and our State has gained added attention and prestige in the eyes of the world.
